None is offered on this occasion. When Sir Edward Grey insisted upon a break of gauge and upon the line running along the coast of Baluchistan he also confessed that the Russian menace remains. It cannot understand the grounds for the opposition that has been awakened. How long can the Indian Empire be kept isolated by a network of buffer States? Suppose Persia chooses to lay a railway, bring it up to the British frontier, or that a future Amir of Afghanistan, more liberal in his views, goes in for a system of railways with a view to improve trade. How can the British Government oppose it unless they are going to assert their right to interfere in any railway Scheme that these two countries might contemplate? After all, is the suspicion of Russia ever to be the dominant note in the foreign policy of the Viceroy? It might be urged that this railway will add to the military burden on the Indian Empire. But will not a recalcitrant Persia or Afghanistan, bent upon having a railway, lead to the same situation? The Russian bogey is better faced than preserved, while the advantages to India by connecting it to Europe by a land route are many. Persia cannot give them; they will have to come from England or Russia or from both. These negotiations, therefore, do to some extent pledge the credit of the country. No doubt if financial guarantees are required, Parliamentary consent will be necessary later, and it can, of course, be withheld. And yet we know what arguments the Government would use if Parliament then threatened to assert its rights. They would say that they had encouraged the promoters to go on with the scheme, and that to back out of it at the last moment would be discreditable. That is the kind of argument that can only be met in advance, and it justifies Parliament in pressing, in and out of season, for the information that is refused. Lynch, formerly Liberal member. It would attack the advantages that our trade possesses for penetrating Persia from the Gulf. It would strengthen the commercial hold that Russia has on the country, and we tend to divert the trade from maritime to land routes. It would greatly surprise us if they had ever occurred either to the Foreign Office or to the Board of Trade. What the Tory Press Thinks. The chronic anarchy in Persia had to be remedied somehow, and a railway, offering as it does the possibility of rapid communication, is a valuable agency for restoring unity to a disintegrating country. The political effects of railways, and in particular the strength they give to centralised bureaucracies, might, indeed, make material for an interesting essay. When Lord Curzon built his railway from Quetta to Nushki, and zealously opened up the trade route to Seistan, he can never have meant his scheme to lose-itself, like. Risks must be taken sometimes, and in this instance they can no longer be evaded. An Eastern Bengal correspondent has sent us a letter in which he combats the statement made by Mr. Montagu on April 19 that the people of the district of Sylhet speak a dialect of Bengali. As a matter of fact, he says, they speak exactly the same language as the rest of the inhabitants of Bengal, the only difference being that their accent differs from that which obtains in and about the town of Calcutta to the same extent as that of other country districts in Bengal removed from the capital. The wound was partially healed in by the re-union of Sylhet with Eastern Bengal; but the modification of the partition has deprived the district of the advantage it then gained. The case of Manbhum, the Sontal Pargana, and part of Singbhum, on the western border of the Bengal Presidency, is put by the correspondent on the same footing as that of Sylhet on the east. The population of these fringe-areas will not fall far short of ten millions. Bengalis form the vast majority of the inhabitants, and Bengali is the court language. They are further supported by the significant language of paragraph The people of the severed districts, as well as those of the Presidency itself, both Hindus and Mahomedans, have strongly protested against their enforced separation. The Bengal Civil Service would welcome their transfer to Bengal, as they contain some of the healthiest stations in the entire region. The European mining industry has already declared itself in favour of the transfer. But the door is, not closed.
