I hope you enjoy my musings, treatment updates, cancer challenges, and on-going medical adventures. Thanks for reading, caring and commenting! Does Horse Poop Cause Cancer?? Saturday, April 14, Caution Not a Happy Post Thank You Life Stealing Myeloma 4. My eyes burn and mist. My nose has gross congestion. My face hurts from all of this. I know the evil cough is coming I feel so fragile I am so frustrated, so sad, so angry, so on the verge of weepy, for how Myeloma has completely stolen my life. Stolen my body, stolen my independence, stolen my spontaneity, stolen my options, stolen my immune system What happened was I tried to live life, tried to have fun, tried to take a risk being just a bit normal, and I got completely sabotaged. No break from my ravages! I just want to cry. I constantly shake my head in disbelief. I remind Myeloma I gave my life to my family, to rescuing animals and humans. Giving my life to helping students become their best, finding their dreams, realizing their goals. I never had huge retirement goals. I just wanted to own my own life. Eat when I want. Laugh and play with family and friends. Play outside, drink in all the beauty Nature has to offer us. Take care of my animals and those in Shelters. Thank you Myeloma for stealing my life, our dreams, plans, goals, freedom, health, spontaneity. Thank you Myeloma for taming me with this awful sinus infection, seized back, giving me a reality check, that NO, I cannot function as a "normal" human being My life now is being sick, avoiding sickness. Battling invasive bugs, battling mutating cancer cells. I felt awful physically and mentally. I gave in, I accepted my status. I laughed-cried at myself every feverish, sore throat, head pounding, nose clogged moment. I just laugh incredulously at my daily Myeloma battle, and my crazy-thinking that I "could be normal" here and there. And yes, as Myeloma patients go, my complaining is ridiculous in many ways, and my heart breaks for all those out there with serious myeloma immobilizing issues. Live happy, live well, and make a difference somewhere, somehow, with someone or something as often as you can!

Story What can I say about the story? Since it has a story? Wrong, it is still episodic even if it has mini-arcs because majority of all episodic shows have stories put right in at the end or as it gradually builds up to it. Oh but they reference the previous cases, so you are wrong! Where this show fails is the mystery aspect or should I even call it a mystery? A hacks main character that knows everything, there, problem solved! We can go home now! Also there is some brief fan-service that is just very questionable, why was it there? What was the purpose? How much were they thinking when they made this? The art is still good, despite not matching the overall tone of the show, it is just weird. The ending song is decent. It was alright, voices matched, kind of. Character With the cast of characters that we are presented to are pretty poorly written. And he also strong? As in physically strong, which kind of came out of nowhere. The purpose of a mystery is to be, well, mysterious! A mystery is what makes the character guess, investigate and piece together what goes with what, but no, she knows EVERYTHING in the universe, which ruins everything since there is no engagement to the show. Hey why not ask her who really assassinated JFK? The mystery was already broken the moment the show started, more specifically, when she was introduced, so that little limit was pointless, just stop show, please. Enjoyment I hate this show, but I enjoy it for how bad the show is, but I had to will my way through this show like a Shounen protagonist that wills their way through the big fight against the big baddie. The best thing to take out of this show. Overall The mystery is a giant letdown; the engagement is just very low. The characters are poorly written in the way it presents them. Sakurako-san is a pretentious anime that tried to be smarter than it actually is and tried to sound smarter than it actually was, way more than its own good. This show is a try-hard show, it tries way to hard to be serious, more serious than it really should have been. This show is just bad and gets a 2.

I hope you enjoy my musings, treatment updates, cancer challenges, and on-going medical adventures. Thanks for reading, caring and commenting! Does Horse Poop Cause Cancer?? So much news at my Tues May 8th monthly Dr appointment and Darzalex infusion. This should get you in the mood! Thank you for reading and caring as you do about my crazy Myeloma journey. See you tomorrow for the Hole story Just to recap, I did the full body Pet Scan back the first week of April, Yes, serious stuff, but I have to laugh at the first Lytic lesion I knew of, was Very fitting for me! I did email my Dr once about it, and she replied that there were lesions seen, but she did not go in to detail. Now I know why, and she indicated this yesterday, at our appointment. There was just too much to tell, as so much was seen, that she of course wanted to explain the details to me in person. And then she showed me the results of the Pet Scan. So I asked her to point on my body, where all the lesions, the holes, were. That brought the point home when she pointed to or touched where I maintained my composure. I was also buzzed on my 40mg steroids, so that helped me still be me. Scott asked me if I saw the scan pictures. She barely mentioned it, and I began shaking my head NO. She smiled, and said she knew I was reluctant, as we had discussed it before, but she wanted me to think about starting it. I said Nope, but Yes, call me stubborn and stupid, but, geezzz, 8 years of treatments, 8 years of side effects, 8 years of mentally processing all of this, 8 years of only having a few "good days" per week All the time having to think about every aspect of myeloma and my health and treatments and side effects and little quality of life. Yes, I am still alive because I have been willing to treat to infinity, and I have great insurance covering my treatments, but I just keep hoping for a magical break. Dr P is a wonderful Dr, and I like her very much, and appreciate her knowledge and style with me. She is very concerned about my status, and does not want myeloma to get ahead of us. She encourages me to consider all options, and I will. Next, off to my "other office", the Chemo Lab. The staff is so caring, concerned, thorough and welcoming. Good poison, powering my weak fighter cells. I feel well taken care of there. Watching the IV drip into my veins gives me a sense of comfort and security, knowing those powerful chemicals are pummeling myeloma and keeping me alive. Keeping me alive for a little while longer. A long while longer? Just please keep me alive magical chemicals Prior to arriving to my appointments, I take 40mg of Dexamethasone steroids when I get up. My happy affect can be so "inappropriate", so I work on taming my party persona, knowing there are new patients, scared patients, sad patients, and very sick patients there, who probably view me as a kooky lunatic, bouncing in as I do. But soon my goofy mood is ambushed with a 50mg push of liquid Benadryl, which quickly counteracts the silly making effects of Dex. I become droopy, mush mouth, blurry brained, dizzy and sleepy. Meds are a powerful thing. I never knew, since prior to myeloma, I rarely needed medications. Soon I feel as if I could sleep, yet my brain is still so alive. I have holes in my bones. Many bones with holes. Holes in my Bones. Up and down my body. From Head to Legs. Minutes turn to hours. Hours of processing my status. What happened to me. When did myeloma invade? How can this be? Is all this a mistake. I just watch everything going on in the chemo lab. So much hustle bustle. Nurses are so busy. Chemo Pharmacists in and out consulting. Drs in and out visiting patients with issues. Patients pushing their IVs to the bathroom. Family members visiting their patients. Families and Friends in and out. Consoling, helping, pushing, supporting. I always come alone. Normally not a need to, although the nurses always worry that I drive myself home. Today I am not ok. Physically I feel ok. Psychologically I am not ok this day. I have to be ok. I make myself ok, even though I am not ok. Tears are welling up. I just found out about them. My reality has changed. What life I have left. I look at my body. Feel my ribs and back. I think about my spine. I feel so disconnected to myself. But I must push forward. I make myself ok. I push back the tears. I smile and chat when necessary. I fake it til I make it. I look at my paperwork and remember my Dr wanted me to get a Femur Xray. I think I know. I pack my bag, say goodbye and thanks, putting on a smiley face. Several nurses say, "wow Julia, you were so quiet today, are you ok? I remember the end of the day in my office. So much to do. I will myself to Radiology. My life is surreal. How can all this be? My name is called, and a sweet friendly tech invites me in, tells me where to go, what to do, how to lay down. She shifts me this way and that. The Xray machine whirs and clicks. Nope, this is my reality. This is my life. Grab my things, I walk to my car. I take the long way there, the outside way, I need fresh air and sunshine.
