The Beginning of the Beginning Wensdays Between Six and Eight This being the twenty-first century, "the man who moves a mountain starts with one small click. My computer skills are of a fairly basic kind, but I know that there is a butler somewhere in my machine, called Jeeves, and I can ask him anything I want, from "Is there life after death? So I asked him, "What can I do about Tibet? Happiness is a great subject, and being happy ourselves is perhaps the best contribution that we can make to the world. On the other hand, I realized that the critics who had accused me of tummy-button gazing were right. I know about the world inside me, but I have no experience in trying to change anything not sporting my navel. Reflecting on this, I was filled with shame. When the day came, I found myself wondering what you wear to demonstrate. But there is a dilemma. If you wear clothes in which you can sit on the pavement and keep dry if it rains, you soon look scruffy and fit far too easily into a category where the Chinese officials and the police can just see "troublemakers. If you can call eight people a crowd. Should you ever venture down Portland Place early on a Wednesday evening, you could be forgiven for being confused. Apparently there is an international law that protects embassies in all countries. If you want to demonstrate outside an embassy, you are obliged to stand on the other side of the road. Fortunately for the Chinese, it happens that Portland Place, where they are lucky enough to have their embassy, is a very wide road. So what you see is a group of demonstrators outside the Royal Institute of British Architects. Car drivers stare curiously at them, presumably thinking that there really are some ugly buildings in the United Kingdom, but what could the vexed individuals be demanding? Meanwhile, the night that I cycled up, peace reigned in the building opposite. No flag was flying to indicate to passersby that it was an embassy. The windows were closed, and the shutters were down. It looked totally deserted. A delightful character with a long beard and long straggly hair arrived and pulled out his homemade banners from a bag that he carried on his back while wobbling along on his bike. Which one would you like? I rather liked "Beep Your Horn for Tibet," but someone else took that. One or two ladies in their sixties. He wore sandals that were falling apart, and most of the buttons had long since parted company with his shirt. No one else spoke to him. He looked very uncomfortable and avoided my eye as I attempted to smile at him. Two women talked between themselves; they seemed to have been demonstrating for many years and maybe they were tired of people who turned up once and never came back. Then the remaining lady said, "Hello.
