Country Girl At Heart. K likes. We're not a business, nor do we sell anything we post. Our sole purpose is to make your day a little brighter, and.

Having been more-or-less in a capital city for the past seven weeks, I needed a breath of fresh air literally. So we escaped to the French countryside. Anyways it was about an hour or so outside of Paris, and absolutely lovely. An entire room of Klein my current favorite at the Pompidou Before I commence with the tales of this weekend, I should mention that on Friday I went back to the Pompidou to see the rest of their permanent collection and to buy a silver ring from a street artist I had seen out front the other day. She was from Mexico as were the stones in the ring and while I am very happy with my purchase, I am very unsatisfied with my Spanish. I tried to exchange a few words in her native tongue, but the only thing I could manage was a feeble, "muchas gracias. Then yesterday morning we left early for the country. I fell asleep in the car I marveled in wonder at the beautiful cheeses, bread, seafood, and yummy-looking produce, all in the tiny main square of the village, surrounded by little cottages with different colored shutters. After that we went back to their house, which was very simple but in a beautiful location. We then sought to go for a walk, but made it no farther than m before being caught in a torrential downpour. Trying to seek shelter under some trees and failing, we finally decided to make a run for it through the sheets of rain. We laughed as we ran and tried not to slip in the mud, Vincent yelling, "Allez, allez, bon, bon! Soaked, we made it back to the house not a moment too soon, where we alternatively took naps and painted. Then we gave walking another try. This is what we found My goodness, it was so beautiful. But out in the country, the little things between the two lifestyles stood out. I mean, duh, but still, it was interesting to see the French version of "country living" in comparison with the Swedish version see below. French people talk a whole lot more. Sweets are less vital, I would say, to the French. But then again, cheese is the dessert. This weekend, goat cheese was the dairy of choice. Meals are all over the place. I think my stomach has actually begun to shrink because I go so long between eating here. Breakfast is optional, lunch is pretty filling, dinner is large and late around pm every night. Small world, but I guess it is Europe. Very old France, old money. In fact, in one room, it was covering every coverable surface. Exposed wooden beams held up a roof that was evidently tiled by hand. Today I read a comic book with decent vocabulary, mind you in French and understood everything. But still, I have a month here. Today when we were walking again through the countryside, I wanted so badly to share the view with my loved ones at home, but alas, postcards and photos will have to do. For now, I should go to bed so I can kick this cold and traipse around Paris like I ought to. Posted by Anneli at.
