If you have the ability to move, then surround yourself with future seers. This particular strength is called Futuristic which by the way, I have no endorsement from the company that created these strengths I just really like them. I am not necessarily an oracle or fortune teller, but I have the ability to see potential, render a vision, and find ways to make the vision a reality. My perfect example is my career as a teacher. I dreamed I would be a German teacher, but that vision started to change when I realized I enjoyed English and theatre more. However, I would be able to do the best of all worlds by running a German exchange on top of my other teaching duties. A dream I had in late middle school evolved into something more rich and meaningful by the time I would graduate high school. Several years later, I would accomplish that dream. Ironically, a new dream would start to evolve once I started directing, critiquing, and even writing theatre. I suspect not everyone has this power or strength. The ability to see into the distant future and construct an ideal world or situation is daunting, difficult, and requires a tremendous amount of creativity. Getting there requires those metrics to multiply exponentially. Well, first of all, surround yourself with people that can. Those people saw a glimmer, a glimpse of something special. They see a child and they dream of him or her becoming a doctor. You get to choose whether or not you want to listen. And then to those of you that are like myself. Spend your time with people who need clarity on their future - kids, young adults, people constantly struggling, and so. And if you try, things will end disastrously. The most mystical element of people who can see into the future is how to build your own. This gets a bit tricky because you have to remove a certain bias. You, of course, can seek help from other seers of the futures, but you will be aware of their skills and also more critical since you have a similar gift.
