By John Stevenson Copyright John Stevenson Malcome walked across the cobbles, avoiding traders setting up their ageing day stalls and reluctantly knocked on the door. No physician welcomed certifying deaths, and these past months there been so many. It seemed to leave a gloom over him that almost never left his shoulders. The door opened and Alice faced him: Bertram was in the main room; he too just silently nodded. As he opened the door a memory of hot days in the middle of the dry time swept into and out of his mind. Faint light that entered through a crack in the curtain, dimly lit the bed, and on it the humped sheet. He crossed the floor to the window and drew the heavy blind: He welcomed the excuse to ignore the corpse; but the sight puzzled him. It was custom to place fresh flowers at the scene of a passing, yet these were withered. He knew women like Alice followed tradition, and was perplexed why she would leave something so obviously dead and shriveled, or the glass vase empty and dry? He pushed the thought from his mind; placing the small medical bag on the side table, then taking out the documents needed to certify death. Massive blood loss caused by a military weapon was not a natural cause, neither was it usual in his experience, but what he wrote would signify the manner of her death and he did not want the young girl to carry stigma in her passing. He wrote nothing, instead going through the motions law required by testing for life signs. Distracted he looked up to see her carrying a large pitcher of water. It was customary that a dead body be washed, once life had officially ceased. He looked back down at the corpse and his body froze. Alice barely noticed his reaction as she respectfully glanced past him to the girls face; then she gasped and dropped the urn. It smashed on the floor with a loud crash. Moments later Bertram came rushing into the room. Woman and physician were staring at the body, both rigid in shock. As the shock eased, they disturbingly observed that it was rippling over her body, as gentle waves move over a calm ocean. He said of a green mist that he once saw that halted the putrefaction. "I thought it was the fantasy of an old man but? Not only because her chest shimmered with the green glow, but also that her arm was cemented to the side of her body with a massive enveloping scab that covered her side from shoulder to elbow. He pulled the sheet right off her and saw other bulbous scabs covered all of both her hands. He looked at Bertram and Alice, shaking his head in disbelief. They were looking expectantly at him, and it made him remember who he was; and the profession he practiced. They expected him to be calm so again he reached for her. Gingerly he touched her flesh, and again the glow raced up his fingers. Malcome steeled himself and held still as the glow slowed and stopped, almost as if it was confused. He felt his hand tingling and warm, whatever the thing was it felt comforting. Malcome looked them both. A few hours ago he too had been convinced she was as good as dead, but now he could feel a pulse. It was only half what he would have expected, but her heart was beating, and strongly. He looked again at her face. He could not be certain but he was sure that colour was returning almost as they watched. Without fully knowing why, he moved to the bottom of the bed and looked across the floor. The pool of water from the bowl Alice had dropped was shrinking: Bertram looked at her, and she at him; their minds brought abruptly back to reality. He almost welcomed a reason to leave the room and he went to the door. He opened it to be fronted by a woman he guessed was around forty years old. She was strikingly beautiful with sharp features framed by long dark hair. She stared at him as if trying to read his thoughts. At that moment Alice came up behind him. Belatedly Bertram call after her. He can do nothing. He turned and smiled at Bertram then back at the woman. Suddenly his smugness evaporated, and the doctor returned. Victoria turned towards him.

Share This is content for CEB One of the hallmarks of a successful leader is the ability to adapt to change and move their teams and organisation forward. But as change becomes a more urgent imperative in the era of digital disruption – compounded by the economic volatility which has persisted since the global financial crisis – leaders have increasingly been found wanting. Clearly, a radically different approach to change management and leadership behaviour is required. Under this model, leaders alone determine the strategic changes the organisation will make and the implementation plans that employees will follow. Employees create personal change implementation plans and companies facilitate open conversations with employees about the change. Such a radical shift in approach requires a change in leadership style, which extends beyond the immediate challenge of transforming an organisation. Leadership is equally exposed to the currents of change as the organisations, departments and business units they lead. Since the GFC organisations have cut costs by removing layers of management. The leaders who are left have much broader responsibilities, bigger portfolios, more stakeholders to manage and much bigger teams, often spread across geographies. But the extension of leadership responsibilities is just one element of the challenge facing leaders. The other is their behaviour as leaders. CEB concludes that less than one-third of departments and business units are led by people equipped to meet the demands of the future. Successful leaders who have developed a new way of working – enterprise leadership – combine excellent individual leadership performance with the ability to create value for the firm as a whole by drawing on expertise from across the organisation. Enterprise leaders are less directive than traditional leaders. Instead they create organisational climates that empower people to find their own solutions. They cultivate the skills and capabilities necessary in their workforce and possess the ability to seek specific, relevant expertise when it is needed for a problem they are trying to solve or an opportunity they want to secure. Enterprise leadership has the potential to transform organisations and drive company-wide performance. Employees respond positively to this style of leadership. Customers respond positively too. Enterprise leaders produce the best results in a modern organisation, but they remain the exception. The challenge is for innovative CEOs and boards to foster a culture of enterprise leadership. Leaders need to spend more time facilitating team performance than trying to solve problems themselves. They are almost exclusively geared towards producing effective individual leaders, with little attention given to how those leaders come together to serve the enterprise. In the new world of constant change and interconnectedness, we need championship teams, not teams of champions.
