Tuesday, July 01, Cover Artwork: Throughout, the poems record and explore the finely-tuned tension that exists between the road and home, between routes and roots, and between the physical world and how poets have been conditioned to observe and represent it. This new collection is a highly-charged literary work-one that engages in dialogues with an array of sources to create a new kind of map of the space that is common to us all. Wexford, who now lives in Missouri. A Tour of Your Country is his fifth volume of poetry to be published by Salmon. He teaches at the University of Missouri-St. Pattered to the seats on which we fret: What a thing of beauty Helsinki is in this May air, the blue and yellow buildings that whisper love and books and Martin Luther, not him again, as wandering way-wardly from Unioninkatu to the train station, I stop to pass an hour with students gathered on Esplanade Park, their heroes Jimi Hendrix, Janis Joplin and Kurt Cobain. She was charming, that ambassador. I shook her hand. Crowds stepped to the Kauppatori. Born in Enniscorthy, Co. Wexford, he has lived in the United States since , and his writing easily glides across the Atlantic; he paces the ocean and pulls the land of his childhood and the land of his adulthood into constant dialogue. His non-fiction, too, explores such themes, most notably in From the Sin-e Cafe to the Black Hills It is therefore fitting that his fifth collection of poetry is called A Tour of Your Country. We cannot pinpoint whose country is being addressed in the title and such ambiguous possession is significant because the ground constantly shifts beneath our feet, it becomes protean and open to interpretation. The title could therefore represent Wall addressing America as an immigrant, or he could be discussing how he no longer feels wholly a part of Ireland, or he could be talking about Finland, which also makes several appearances in this book. The slipperiness of this word disallows and frustrates a sense of home. Like Wall himself, we are in constant motion. We move from one country to another and our imagination is never allowed to settle, which makes each page of this book exciting, unpredictable, and compelling. As we move from Omaha to Helsinki to the Slobs a wildfowl reserve in County Wexford , these poems firework with vibrant words and surprising observations. Stops along the way include places such as Great Fountain Geyser, Tangle Creek, Mud Pot, and Biscuit Basin, all of which become single lines of text as if they were nothing more than stops along a bus route. There is no narrative voice here, only a list of touristy place names. From the beginning of this collection we are reminded that foreign places are always more than just names; for those who visit them with a generous eye they become delicate and fragile. While in Finland he listens to the US Ambassador address a group of university students but he silently asks: Although Wall could easily claim his Irish background and disavow any relationship with an unpopular American presidency, he instead becomes wholly American and celebrates the work of Jimi Hendrix and Kurt Cobain with these students. The true ambassador of this poem is Wall himself and, by concealing his Irish identity while in Finland, he complicates and expands what it means to be a citizen. Wall moves gracefully between memories of his birth country and his adopted home, and we swim in his imagination as he brings Old and New World together. The closing lines are masterful because they lock his past and present together with a neat click: Just as Wall dreamed of America as a child, his own child now dreams of Ireland. Readers may get confused by such concepts as Kaamos, the location of the Slobs, the meaning of Crex Crex; similarly, they may not be familiar with the Finnish poet Mirkka Rekola. A Notes section would have been helpful, especially since this book is a poetic tour guide through so many foreign landscapes. This is a small point of criticism, though, one that is easily solved by the reader with a little external research. The great joy of this book is how we wander between Ireland, America, and elsewhere. These are people who are both from a country and not from a country. Increasingly, and with the recent passing of James Liddy, Eamonn Wall has become one of the most prominent and exciting contemporary voices of the Irish-American experience. He has an intimate understanding of what it means to be neither here nor there, and his words pull us toward new places. A Tour of Your Country reminds us that we are all linked to foggy roads elsewhere, and it celebrates displacement with the exuberant joy of a homecoming. Palimpsests of imagery and resonance emerge. Not only the US but Ireland is full of wonders and pleasures for this generous writer: Fiona Sampson is the editor of Poetry Review. Always conscious throughout his work of the US immigrant experiences of other peoples as well as his own Irish one, the poet recalls the passage by train of Basque shepherds to their new holdings in another Idaho poem, Basque Museum, Boise. Irish history, heritage and, indeed, bird life, are abiding features in the Wall mindscape, while the poems Helsinki Sequence and Kaamos are inspired by time spent in Finland. A hugely impressive collection.

But what other offerings can we look forward to at pow wows and has anything changed behind the scenes of the traditional goodies? In some ways, not much has shifted. Sure enough, the dominant pow wow foods are the same as they were 30 years ago. Smell the fry bread yet? They tell me the sodium gets their heart rate going so they dance stronger. Nutritional awareness aside, vendors strive to be original in both senses of the word. One time an emcee announced that we were selling Indian steaks the crowd came running. Fry Bread Flour, water, baking powder, salt, oil: Now, many vendors are using canola oil instead of trans fats and other potentially harmful oils. Traditional Game Elk, bison, venison, and other indigenous meats are now a part of the pow wow scene. This reflects a national food trend: The National Bison Association reports that is the best year yet for bison sales. Corn Grilled corn has competition depending on your region. In the Southwest, pozole, made with corn and slaked lime, may be offered, alongside tamales and arepas. Arepas also make appearances in areas that have high Latin American populations, such as New York and California. Morseau cooks his for two days: Wojape, a berry pudding, is popular in the Plains, and other regional custards include flan in the Southwest, dried fruit in the Pacific Northwest, and squash in northern regions. But as with festivals across the country indigenous and non-indigenous alike lemonade takes top honors. The hot-and-now foods of American festivals have recently staked a claim on pow wows. I work under a canopy, setting up from scratch every pow wow it can be hard to compete with those vendors. But to keep a native rhythm and dollars flowing to native vendors, you may want to save funnel cakes for the county fair.

Salmon Poetry, 57 pp. Born in Enniscorthy, Co. Wexford, he has lived in the United States since , and his writing easily glides across the Atlantic; he paces the ocean and pulls the land of his childhood and the land of his adulthood into constant dialogue. These may be differing geological landscapes but he blends them together, pointing first to Ireland, then to the Midwest, and his wordsâ€”like a tightening center of gravityâ€”bind these two worlds together. It is therefore fitting that his fifth collection of poetry is called A Tour of Your Country. From the outset we are doubly displaced from the land in question because the word "tour" implies a lack of intimate knowledge while the use of "your" suggests uncertain ownership. We cannot pinpoint [End Page ] whose country is being addressed in the title and such ambiguous possession is significant because the ground constantly shifts beneath our feet, it becomes protean and open to interpretation. The title could therefore represent Wall addressing America as an immigrant, or he could be discussing how he no longer feels wholly a part of Ireland, or he could be talking about Finland, which also makes several appearances in this book. There is no narrative voice here, only a list of touristy place names. And yet, the last stop is "Dinner at the Lodge" along with the lines: From the beginning of this collection we are reminded that foreign places are always more than just names; for those who visit them with a generous eye they become delicate and fragile. This sense of being a visitor permeates the entire collection, and Wall deftly acknowledges the complexity of his own national identity in "Hearing the Ambassador Speak. Although Wall could easily claim his Irish background and disavow any relationship with an unpopular American presidency, he instead becomes wholly American and celebrates the work of Jimi Hendrix and Kurt Cobain with these students. The true ambassador of this poem is Wall himself and, by concealing [End Page ] his Irish identity while in Finland, he complicates and expands what it means to be a citizen. The closing lines are masterful because they lock his past and present together with a neat click: Just as Wall dreamed of America as a child, his own child now dreams of Ireland. His sensitivity to place and language is particularly subtle because he refers to the Indians of his youth as "Sioux" but later mentions their more proper tribal name as "Lakota. Omaha, Nebraska," and "The Art of Forgetting. We lean forward with him to eavesdrop on "two lively knitters" and the whole scene is so well paced we can almost smell the coffee as the "espresso machine shrieks up and up higher. Readers may get confused by such concepts as Kaamos, the location of the Slobs, the meaning of Crex Crex; similarly, they may not be familiar with the Finnish poet Mirkka Rekola.
