A walk in the fields by Wallace Kirkland, , Reilly & Lee Books edition, in English.

It was because of this magnificent teacher that I had in my home town. We just got a house in the country and I got a nice and dry basement. And, I found my first music writing notebook from my piano teacher. I always thought I started when I was five. This woman was from Chicago. She was an amazing stride pianist and classical pianist. The only reason that she moved to this little farm town in Southwest Minnesota was that her daughter lived there. She also had a son and husband, but they both died of cancer in one month. So, she went to live with her daughter and give up Chicago to start teaching piano lessons. They were about the same age and were both from Chicago. At the time that I knew Mrs. These music notebooks confirmed everything that I remember. I remember my first lesson, because the date is in there. Starting somewhere, going away and then something making you feel that you have to come back around and plant yourself back at home. It was really a cute way to teach me and yet underneath it is really profound. She encouraged me to write music; she taught me not just classical music, but also popular. But the foundation I got from here was really the most important kind. How does music work? Why does it feel the way it feels? I grew up in the extreme contrast to me being a Wynton Marsalis, who grew up in the hotbed of jazz with his father who was so studied and strong and could teach in a historic kind of way with all that history around you. I was very lucky there. But, to me, there was a depth of expression that was more than excitement that could bring you to tears. And Bob this subtlety, this space and nuance, gentleness and melding of genres without trying to do it. Everything that he loved came out in his music. And Brookmeyer-he had all the sophistication of development that a classical composer would have. It was a whole piece coming out of a germ of an idea, not necessarily a song. That intense skill he had of developing in a jazz context really appealed to me because I had been studying all of this sophisticated development of classical music. So, the idea of breaking out of the idea that jazz was just basically theme and variations was very expansive to me. So, they were both interesting in different ways. Also, they were both in subtle ways deeply in respect of each other and were also slightly intimidated by each other. Did you notice my silence? Going back a little bit. So when I moved to New York and wanted to start a band, a big band seemed like a logical choice. Then, when I had my own band and recorded, people started to come and hear the band, and they would invite me to come and work with their big bands! If I had written for a smaller group which I really wanted to with bassoon, French horn, viola and accordion, I would have had a handful of concerts. So what everyone says is economically the poorest choice actually became an okay choice. I would say that now it is getting harder because a lot of the radio big bands in Europe are losing their funding and Europe is having a rough time right now, and that is largely where I was making my living. The hard thing is touring. It happened last February a week before we left. If somebody cancels a contract like that in Europe, what are you going to do? But the key thing that has allowed me to make my living was the life changing aspect when ArtistShare started. I brought my band out to Ojai 2 years ago, but the tax laws there are just awful! There is a lot of mutual respect in both directions that makes it fulfilling for all of us, so we keep going! This enables me to establish something that gives people depth and interest on other levels. Maybe they want to become a higher level participant and have more of a connection to the musicians in the band and come to a recording session. There are some people on this planet that have the money and want to help and be a bigger part of the music world. And it lets me give them something more than just the feeling that they are giving a handout. The music industry right now is completely the opposite. Through the web site and just getting the word out. Here are the perks and what you get. I had a record release gig and a few of those bronze, silver and gold people were able to come. We had a little get together. It was very fun to see the guys in the band meeting these people. They met the designer of the cd. It was really great, and I think that they enjoy having that contact. I enjoy meeting with them too. You want me to come back here to live. Yes, they can be rude, but I like New Yorkers. There is less sarcasm there and less guile. People are friendly; they may not be as apt to really bring you into their world. There is a bit of a friendliness with a healthy distance. Because, when you live in Manhattan, Queens, Brooklyn or wherever you live, your neighborhood becomes like a little small town. You have certain stores that you frequent. Your neighborhood becomes your little village, which is very different from living in a house somewhere, driving to a mall or a big box store. To me that feels very isolating. Everything is such a mystery. I think that faith is wonderful and an amazing thing. I think that life was meant to be a mystery. And yet, there are universal truths. To me, there is joy in the mystery. I love when people can look at religion and can see it in a more broad and loving kind of way. This year was both fun and exhausting because I made this new album. I hope to do more collaborations. I kind of just put one foot ahead of the next and never look too far ahead. When you do that, and do it with a lot of love, hard work and good intentions and keep yourself open to live a life improvisationallyâ€”you open myself up to a lot of opportunities. But then, everyone is different; some are better planners. They might have spun their wheels without strong goals. Each of us has to listen to our inner self as to how we run and work.
