Apparently, del Toro also really liked it. Both he and Stephen King called "Tigers" a top film of Like many del Toro films, it defies genre and blends fantasy, realism, and horror into something undefinable. I ran through the entire gamut of emotions while watching and felt quite melancholy as the credits rolled. Her first industry job was working as a director for Mexican Sesame Street, which is a totally random fun fact. Best time to watch: Worst time to watch: If they do, I will update this section accordingly. When her mom goes missing, Estrella Paola Lara wishes for her to return. Yes, her mother is back, but she is also dead. Frightened, Estrella leaves her house and joins a group of abandoned children who live on the street. They are followed wherever they go. The film opens with a black screen and some staggering information about the Mexican drug war: Entire areas of some cities are turning into ghost towns. There are no numbers for the children the dead and the missing have left behind. When asked about how she came up with the concept for the film, this is what she said: That was like a huge moment of truth for me, it sounds terrible and kind of messianic but I felt a call, like someone needs to talk about this. How will the country survive? I wonder, too, if those abandoned kids will even have the chance to become adults. As cartels expand into human trafficking, child organ harvesting becomes a concern. After they talk about common characters and tropes, the teacher gives them their assignment: The camera pulls away from the wall and we see the spray painted tiger in full, along with the young boy who created it. In the next scene, we see him steal a gun and a phone from a likely intoxicated man who is pissing in the street. Because he had forgotten how to be a prince. Like in fairy tales Kids should never have to deal with violence like this, but they frequently do The government in the US, Mexico, the UK - everywhere seems to only value young life when it exists in the body of a woman. The rest of "Tigers" focuses on Estrella and her 3 wishes, which add a flair of magical realism to the bleak landscape of ghost town Mexico. We look for the sermon in the suicide, for the social or moral lesson in the murder of five. We interpret what we see, select the most workable of the multiple choices. We live entirely, especially if we are writers, by the imposition of a narrative line upon disparate images, by the "ideas" with which we have learned to freeze the shifting phantasmagoria which is our actual experience. We do this our entire lives, but more fantastically in childhood, I think. I can look back on random events or thoughts and bundle them together in a somewhat realistic narrative. What I suck at is doing this in the moment. As a child, and even a teenager, I was much better at crafting stories for myself and envisioning the world as I wanted it to exist. Imagination and reality were often melded together in a way that made them both indistinguishable. The child actors in this film are fantastic. The moment when Morro Nery Arredondo crawled over to Estrella and gave her an animal cracker, I knew that his inevitable death was going to devastate me. Donald Trump would shoot a child in the face in exchange for reelection or a full head of real hair. The animated graffiti, stuffed tiger, snake on the gun handle, and birds from the bracelet were all nice touches that I enjoyed seeing throughout the film. Maybe I should cover a Nancy Meyers movie next.
