A concise and handy book, packed full of checklists and helpful hints for parents of kids with "stars in their eyes". This book is a treasure trove of information on topics such as finding an agent, how to get decent headshots taken, preparing for auditions, acting schools, and most importantly avoiding scams.

What You Need to Know Auditions for kids and teens are plentiful. But you have to know where to look. And who to talk to They were all children when they got their start. And they all had an agent. Agents and Managers For adult actors, representation is not as important. But when finding auditions for kids, they must have an agent first. Ever been to an open casting call for the Disney Channel? Everyone and their mother is there. And speaking of Disney, read this article about how to become a Disney Channel actress. Agents and managers can save you from that stressful experience by getting you a private audience with the powers that be. Search for acting studios in major cities near you. Call and ask if they teach a class for kids or teens. This is another good signal that the studio is poaching kids to sign contracts. Ask questions, seek answers. Someone connected to that studio is an agent or manager. Make sure they know who you are. From a class of 30 kids, maybe 1 will be approached about working with an agent. The strategy is simple: Find the right community and become an indispensable part of it. This is how success works. Or even a different acting studio. Keep your eyes and ears open. Be Careful Some agents and managers can get you into private acting auditions for teens and kids. But others are just liars and charlatans. They ask for money. Because agents and managers get a percentage of what you earn as an actor. If they ask for money up front, it means they might take it and disappear. And the same goes for organizations like ProScout , which promise to set you up with agents and managers. Much better than us adults. And imagination is one of the key components of acting talent. Too much structure and not enough creativity. But stick to classes like voiceover or commercial technique. Plenty of time for that later. Make auditions for kids your first priority. Stage Mothers The musical fable Gypsy is about Mama Rose pushing her daughters to be vaudeville performers. But along the way, she exposes them to adult situations, and destitution. Mama Rose is the ultimate stage mother: Agressive, domineering, and downright pushy. So what happens to her? She ends up alone, desperate, and abandoned by her family. A simple word of caution for parents: The Bottom Line Auditions for kids are out there. Share this with another actor
