Her kids have grown up exploring the trails of Maine on foot, skis and bikes as well as through the Geocaching and EarthCache games. The family has found treasures of all sorts while out on the trail and the journey continues to be as much fun now that the kids are teenagers as it was when they were preschoolers. First-come, first-serve campsites are available at many of the White Forest National Forest campgrounds in New Hampshire, just a short drive over the Maine border. To ensure you have at least a couple of campsite options, get to the area around noon. This strategy worked well when a friend and I decided on a last-minute camping and hiking trip over the Fourth of July holiday weekend. With a two-night, three-day stay in the White Mountains, choosing hikes based on what appeals to you mountain summits, waterfalls or both and that suits your fitness level takes a bit more planning. Choose an easy hike on the first day to warm up, take on a tough climb for the second day and go for a moderate option before driving home.
DAY 1 After a campsite set-up, you might only have a few hours before sunset to squeeze in a hike. There is a small trail spur to see the base of the waterfall before the main trail takes you up the steep but short climb to the AMC Zealand Falls Hut. The ascent on the Bridle Path is a steady climb for 2. There is a donation request for baked goods when available at the huts. Bring a few dollars in your pack because they are usually worth the donation. Parking is available on both sides of the road with an underground tunnel to get to the trail. Arethusa Falls in Crawford Notch is worth the effort to get there. DAY 3 With packing up the campsite and knowing you have to drive home, a hike to a waterfall can be just the right option for your last day in the mountains. That elevation gain puts this in the moderate hike category, so be prepared for the workout. The waterfall, the second tallest in New Hampshire, cascades over a wide rock cliff.
