Arrow to the Heart is the new, non-fiction book by Christopher Kortlander that tells the gripping account of how he fought off the federal government and exposed a vast conspiracy of corruption and espionage.

Design factors[edit] The original Hearts and Arrows were diamonds that surfaced in the mid s in Japan that embodied three important design factors. The first of these factors was that they were cut to what is known in the diamond industry as "ideal proportions," i. Second, they were cut with very good physical and optical symmetry so that they would garner the grade of "Excellent" in the system used by Japanese laboratories. The third important factor was that they were cut to a very specific brilliantine scheme to produce the accepted hearts and arrows pattern. This faceting scheme involves prescribed lengths and ratios as well as smaller table sizes that are imperative in producing a distinctive, repeatable and gradable hearts and arrows pattern. This is in large part due to the greater amount of rough diamond that necessitates additional polishing to create diamonds with this precise optical symmetry. Diamond polishers take up to three times longer to cut diamonds of this cut quality, with much greater waste of the original diamond rough material. Using specialized tooling and high quality cutting wheels and in some cases X magnification, factories must employ careful analysis through every stage of production. Diamonds cut in this way are more expensive than average cut diamonds. Hearts and Arrows viewer[edit] To see the hearts and arrows pattern in a diamond, a specially designed light-directing viewer called a Hearts and Arrows scope. This hearts and arrows viewer is a simple device that allows the viewer to analyze the physical symmetry, contrast and alignment of facets of a diamond by viewing the stone through both the top crown and bottom pavilion of a diamond, by directing white and colored light at set angles in order to catch and reflect light back from specific facets and angles of the diamond. This kind of consistent cutting was unheard of at the time and cut grading did not exist yet in America. It has also become a popular sales tool in diamond marketing. However, a Hearts and Arrows grading in conjunction with Excellent or Ideal cut grade will give a superb sparkle. Hearts and Arrows labeling[edit] Some in the diamond industry disagree on which diamonds should receive the "Hearts and Arrows" label. Because there used to be no industry standard , one person or company may say a diamond is a Hearts and Arrows diamond while another may say it is not. In the industry, the term "super ideal" is a common term that is coined and used to describe diamonds displaying perfect optical symmetry. Most diamonds with an overall cut graded by GIA as "Excellent" with Excellent symmetry as well or American Gem Society as "0" or "Ideal" will have some sort of hearts and arrows pattern when seen through a viewer, although the pattern may not be perfect. Many within the diamond industry believe the Hearts and Arrows pattern should be graded, and only those with the top grade should be called Hearts and Arrows. There are generally five main components that help to define a "Hearts and Arrows" super-ideal cut diamond. The diamond industry is still somewhat behind the latest technological advances in hearts and arrows precise optical symmetry and thus have not established firm criteria for evaluating stones on this level.
