An Autumn Reverie by William Topaz www.enganchecubano.com Beautiful Summer now hath fled And the face of Nature doth seem dead And the leaves are withered and falling off the trees By the nipping and.

Through all the weary, hot midsummer time, My heart has struggled with its awful grief. And I have waited for these autumn days, Thinking the cooling winds would bring relief. For I remembered how I loved them once, When all my life was full of melody. And I have looked and longed for their return, Nor thought but they would seem the same, to me. The fiery summer burned itself away, And from the hills, the golden autumn time Looks down and smiles. The fields are tinged with brown" The birds are talking of another clime. The forest trees are dyed in gorgeous hues, And weary ones have sought an earthy tomb. But still the pain tugs fiercely at my heart" And still my life is wrapped in awful gloom. The winds I thought would cool my fevered brow, Are bleak, and dreary; and they bear no balm. The sounds I thought would soothe my throbbing brain, Are grating discords; and they can not calm This inward tempest. Still it rages on. My soul is tost upon a troubled sea, I find no pleasure in the olden joys" The autumn is not as it used to be. I hear the children shouting at their play! Their hearts are happy, and they know not pain. To them the day brings sunlight, and no shade. And yet I would not be a child again. For surely as the night succeeds the day, So surely will their mirth turn into tears. And I would not return to happy hours, If I must live again these weary years. I would walk on, and leave it all behind: This poem is in the public domain. She was a popular writer characterized mainly by her upbeat and optimistic poetry, though she was also an activist. Her poetry collections include Poems of Passion W. She died in Connecticut on October 30,

4: Poem: An Autumn Reverie by William Topaz McGonagall

I love the beginning of fall. The temperature drops, the sun droops a little lower, and warm sweaters come out of hibernation. To me, fall is a promising time of new beginnings and exciting opportunities, a time for creature comforts and quiet pursuits.
