

1: Arrogance and anxiety : the ambivalence of German power, - ECU Libraries Catalog

The arrogance and anxiety shown by Germany during pre times, the perception of the nation as both powerful and threatened, was, he suggests, characteristic, to some degree, of every major.

It is beyond being egotistical. It is beyond being proud. Arrogant people can see the faults and shortcomings in everybody except themselves. There was a brother in my church who wanted to condemn everybody for their sin. Arrogance abounds in this world in so many different forms. Rich people think they are better because they have money. Highly educated people think they are better because they possess a piece of paper to prove it. Government people feel they are better because they hold office. Very talented artists think because of their genius they are above others. Here is the biggest argument against arrogance, and that is that arrogant people rule the world and they are doing a terrible job at it. People are destroying the Earth and the life-sustaining ecosystem it provides for some fictional concept called money. When you break it down, money is only pieces of paper or digits on a computer, that holds no intrinsic value. Still, based on that conservative effort the injustice is blatantly obvious. This divide translates into human suffering, such as starvation, malnutrition, disease, homelessness, lack of education, and other maladies. Arrogant men sit in think tanks with their brilliant brains thinking how they can put their fellow human beings down and capitalize on the misery of others. Usually what this amounts to is the violent manipulation of governments or war. Arrogant men have built such deadly nuclear and biological weapons that if they were ever used they would terminate all life on this planet. There are many alternatives to our way of life. The problem is that the arrogant people in charge are not humble enough to realize that they could be wrong at all, let alone in their core premises. They fail to see their own evil and selfishness. In truth, the majority of arrogant people are narcissistic and they feel entitled. It is high time we challenged the status quo. Arrogant people may be intelligent and have a lot of knowledge but certainly they lack wisdom. There is still time to divert mankind from our path of destruction. But we must organized and challenge the conventional norms. We must build a community where everybody is adequately taken care of, anything else would be cruel and criminal. Such alternative ideas have been presented many times in our past. Normally those in charge have dealt violently with those who challenge the system. Here is a link to it. He is a published writer and works with the Church of Christ. John has lived with bipolar for over thirty years and has been hospitalized nine times, three of which were committed. John has chronicled his life story in his memoirs "More Than The Madness". John believes in the power of words to change the world for the better. His website can be seen here. ### 2: Understanding the psychology of an arrogant person

Even though arrogance is the last thing you're feeling during a conversation, it's important to understand why this confusion happens. Awareness is the first step. Awareness is the first step. Posted by Alex Barker in Social Anxiety.

Understanding the psychology of an arrogant person By Hanan Parvez Jim was an employee at a sales company who had joined recently. His arrogance was primarily directed toward his juniors whom he used to treat very kindly before. What on earth made him change his attitude? An arrogant person is the one who acts as if he is superior, more worthy and more important than the others. Therefore, he puts others down and even disrespects them. At the same time, he wants to be admired and respected. You have done great things In many cases, a person becomes arrogant when he makes the kind of achievements that his peers fail to make. You have some weak points too and you know it. Know that others are not less worthy than you just because they never did what you were able to do. I could go on and on giving reasons but the point is- you have no reason to be arrogant and think that others are less worthy than you even if you did something remarkable. You may behave arrogantly to hide your insecurity , inferiority and a lack of confidence. Arrogance, in this case, helps you to kind of reject others before they can get an opportunity to reject you! The truth, however, is that you cared a lot about their approval and were afraid of their rejection. This is the reason why a lot of people tend to behave arrogantly with strangers or with people they barely know. Friends and family members accept you- you know that. But who knows how a stranger might respond? Sometimes, arrogance may just be the result of trying to gain attention because no other way of gaining attention has worked for you. Jim, the guy I mentioned at the beginning of this post, was very hard working. He did his work diligently and expected others, especially his seniors, to appreciate him for that. But his seniors never gave him any appreciation and ignored him. In short, they treated him like crap. This obviously hurt Jim a lot and he had to find a way to regain his lost self-worth. So he decided to become arrogant- not toward his seniors but toward his juniors. So he focused on the innocent juniors who sort of cared about his approval. By treating them badly, Jim regained his self-worth and felt good about himself again.

But one thing you are definitely not feeling is confident – let alone arrogant. So why is it common for people to mistake shyness for arrogance? Your self-esteem is also likely to be very low. Self-esteem is your feeling of self-worth. This lack of self-esteem leads to a range of safety behaviours. You might find it difficult to smile at someone in-case they reject you. You might avoid people altogether. You feel extremely self-conscious so you spend a lot of time and energy on your appearance. But other people confuse this with rudeness. As socially anxious or shy people, we often assume everyone else is confident or happy. Do they think badly of me? Do they think they are too good for me?! This is obviously more common with strangers. So here are a few tips you can use to prevent your shyness being confused for arrogance: Try to look people in the eye when talking to them. Try to smile more. Ask a few questions. It takes some time and effort. But the results are worth it. And it seems there are actually quite a lot of reasons. At this point you might be thinking: In fact, the majority of people can tell the difference between someone who is shy and arrogant. People with low self-confidence are also more likely to mistake shyness for arrogance. While they might seem calm on the outside, on the inside they are frantically analysing every conversation for any sign of an insult. Just something to keep in mind. You stop looking people in the eye, adopt a closed body language, give short responses and rarely smile at least when talking to strangers. You can reduce the chances of this happening by making an effort to look people in the eye, smile more and asking questions to show your interest. But the most effective way to solve it is to improve your conversation skills, including your contribution, body language and mindset. Awareness is the first step.

Arrogance doesn't show confidence, it shows too much pride and insolence, or egotism. I would hate to be seen as an arrogant person, i'd much rather be myself, meek as I may be. Reply With Quote.

February 7, Can anyone with GAD, or some other MI, BP what have you, resist going off like a Pipeline wave on a shallow reef , big north swell when some arrogant person is cross with the peace of the day? Is it just me? I had just finished my lunch at the ski lodge, which was empty, lots of tables, seats, and I cleared my table off by moving my tray to an empty table. BTW this lodge has bus boys to clear the trays. I have a thing about dirty dishes, too. As soon as I do this, I notice that this person is giving me the evil eye, standing there gesturing and huffing about. He already picked out a table but NOW Mr. Arrogant wanted to sit at this already dirty table.. I just was sitting there, and I knew he was going to say something, so I asked him what his so obvious problem was. Oh, I got an answer, I was taking up two tables huh. I said nicely to him that the lodge had bus service and would be there in a matter of minutes to clear the table, I even offered to flag the boys down. This was quickly setting me off. I told him to chill out, get mellow, but this was not taken and the battle began, I said no I will not, period, that he should chill out and wait for the dudes to clear it off. He was a young Black man, and he was not satisfied with my refusal to comply with his demands. He then called ME a Nasty Old man I said listen dude I did not ask for your opinion of my age or temperment. At this point I am laughing into a full blown wacked out anxiety melt down with shaking and racing thoughts to crush this arrogant, invading my space jerk garden shrub jerk. Luckily my wife came back, before I really flipped, and stood in between us. She called him halfed baked for carrying on with me about stupid trays and just moved them back to our table. Oh, now I can see I should have, but in that instant I could not.
