1: Penn State University - Job - Assistant/Associate Professor of History

The time for advancement between associate to full professor is less rigid than for assistant to associate. Typically, failure to be promoted to associate professor from assistant results in termination following a 1-year appointment.

Distinguished, Endowed or University Professor Other such titles of special distinction vary by institution Professor " Full Professor ", i. The first three apply to people who have outside activities such as medical practice, professional engineer, lawyer and do not work full-time in a research capacity. The title Research Professor is sometimes given to people who also work, in parallel, for a research institute not connected to a university or are faculty on a department performing only research, typically on grant-based "soft money". Background[ edit ] Traditionally, Assistant Professor has been the usual entry-level rank for faculty on the "tenure track", although this depends on the institution and the field. Then, promotion to the rank of Associate Professor and later Professor informally, "Full Professor" indicates that significant work has been done in research, teaching, community service, etc. It typically takes about six years or so to advance in rank. The time for advancement between associate to full professor is less rigid than for assistant to associate. Typically, failure to be promoted to associate professor from assistant results in termination following a 1-year appointment. Faculty can remain at associate level more or less indefinitely at most institutions even if they are not promoted further. Traditionally for "professional" fields such as engineering, law, medicine, business, or management " and lately expanding to others " faculty types can also include Clinical Professor or Professor of Practice. Likewise for the less-common title of Teaching Professor, which is not limited to professional fields. Recently, some institutions have created separate tenure tracks for such positions, which may also be given other names such as "lecturer with security of employment". The term "professor" as a common noun is often used for persons holding any kind of faculty position. In academic medicine, Instructor usually denotes someone who has completed residency, fellowship, or other post-doctoral M. Any faculty title preceded with the qualifier "Adjunct" normally denotes part-time status usually less than half-time. Although "Professor" is often the highest rank attained by a senior faculty member, some institutions may offer a unique title to a senior faculty member whose research or publications have achieved wide recognition. This may be a "named professorship" or "named chair" " for example, the "John Doe Professor of Philosophy". Large research universities also offer a small fraction of tenured faculty the title of "Distinguished Professor", "Distinguished Teaching Professor", or "Distinguished Research Professor" to recognize outstanding contributions. In research, faculty who direct a lab or research group may in certain research contexts e. Excepting special ranks such as endowed chairs , academic rank is dependent upon the promotion process of each college or university. Thus, a tenured associate professor at one institution might accept a "lower" position at another university i. Temporary faculty and special appointments[ edit ] Modifier.
