Baz pulled strings backstage, getting Mac to win both a Royal Rumble and an infamous Money in The Bank match that was originally won by Zangief, creating the "Mr. The relationship turned sour however, as after Mac refused to slaughter Zangief with a steel chair, they had a falling out. Bazza was, for a time, controlling the mysterious masked wrestler known as Mr. He attempted to cover up whoever hit Little Mac with a car for then-unknown reasons. In addition to Mr. After a quick late night example of a VGCW match, he got a huge promotion Recently, Bazza has been captured by the Twitch Security Guards. Enough evidence has been put against him to arrest him thanks to Phoenix Wright. Hopefully he receives the justice he deserves. And with my last breath, I curse Zoidberg! Raphael, Ezio Auditore, and Gary Oak. The detectives managed to easily beat Ezio and Gary, and with much effort Nappa took down Raphael, giving the turtle his first loss. They were seen by Baz, who was still furious over Mac refusing to attack Zangief after their climatic final battle. Snake and Mac had no choice but to tell Baz about everything that has happened, and in an effort to keep the secret from getting out, entrusted Baz with the book on mind control that he would go on to brainwash Luigi with. This was done to prevent a time paradox, and Baz would enlist the aid of The Elite 4 to help protect the truth from getting out and destroying the universe. With this shocking revelation, the crowd was stunned to learn that ever since Season 2, Mr. McMahon had been a good guy all along, creating the Mr. L persona and eventually getting arrested for the sake of us all. History will never know what he did. No one will ever learn the truth. His story, his debriefing, will endure only in our hearts. Everything he did, he did for his company. He sacrificed his freedom and his honor for VGCW. He was a real hero. He was a true patriot. Well, that, or a bad person forced by universal powers far beyond his control into being a good person for the sake of not causing the universe which included him to unravel. But why split hairs? Vowing to fix the chaos that has transpired since his arrest, Baz declared that there would be a new Great Tournament to find a new GM. With signs of ring rust apparent, Kefka literally was walking over him for some time during their match, until Bazza harnessed all the trout he had been donated over the past year into the Troutman Suplex, scoring the victory and advancing to the Quarter Finals Adam was ready to fight hard for his chance of securing his deserved job, but once again, his GM dreams were cut short. Bazza had stopped Jensen from taking over the company before, and he did it again, defeating Jensen and eliminating him from the tournament. He came out to the ring to announce his inevitable victory, and in his rage, Bazza stormed out to put a stop to him and kick his arse. He challenged Illidan to a fight at End Game 9 to prove he knew something of power after all. There was little confidence for Mr McMahon about a victory over the terrifying demon. Did the audience not realise they were talking about the boss himself? The fight between the two was close and brutal, but Illidan seemed to be pulling ahead when Bazza flipped his bloody lid and smashed Illidan with the Troutman Suplex, followed by the Bazza Curse. And thus, the audience who doubted Bazza were proven completely Illidan stood up from this powerful barrage and broke Bazza with another Ready Check. Even the man who prepared the entire show was not prepared for Illidan Stormrage. His job completed, Bazza McMahon got into a limo and left the scene, either satisfied with a job well done, or not willing to spend even one moment in a company run by Gary Oak. He left in a limo this time and not in handcuffs. Bazza and the Holidays Edit Bazza despises Christmas, but no one is sure why. Or maybe even his heart was two sizes too small. His hate for the holiday spirit drove him to cancel VGCW unless someone beat him in a wrestling match. After winning against Jesus, Bazza released on Christmas Parole took to the squared circle, verbally dressed Gabe down and beat some sense into him. All in all it was as dignified as any office Christmas party. Fans who blamed Bazza for Zangief being "screwed" were given a scapegoat in the form of a nefarious heel to boo. Bazza himself stated that he does not particularly like the use of self-insertion in fiction, making it likely that when Baz McMahon got released from jail, he would stay out of the spotlight. This later turned out to be anything but, as Baz McMahon returned on November 4th, , albeit likely to be only temporarily. He also has a phobia of numbers.

McGuinness were appalled by its gauche ockerism and they panned it. Audiences adored it and it was a runaway success, becoming the most successful and popular all-Australian film ever made up to that time. In many senses it was the first truly Australian feature film for decades, even though most of the action takes place in London. In the book The New Australian Cinema producer Phillip Adams remarked on the casting, saying that that few local actors had ever played a broad Australian role or could "do" the ocker accent. Australian imitations, he said, were reserved for comedians. The plot is simple -- young Barry, chaperoned by his Auntie Edna, must travel to London in order to collect an inheritance. Arriving in Blighty, he meets up with his old mate Curly and proceeds through a series of misadventures at the hands of assorted "Pommy bastards", charming numerous Pommy sheilas along the way. The dialogue is resolutely Ocker throughout, with plenty of mild swearing, sexual jokes galore, loads of gratuitous sex, nudity, toilet and body humour. A great example is the classic exchange between Barry and Blanche Julie Covington where he indicates that he needs to use the toilet by running through every Aussie slang term for urination every devised, to the complete bewilderment of his English hosts. There are also some cute visual jokes, like the digs at British hygiene with a running sight gag about a typhoid epidemic, and the cute advertisement for "High Camp" cigarettes on the tube station. Pop-culture buffs will also notice one brief scene that features an original poster for London OZ magazine on a wall in the background. The late, great Dennis Price does a fine cameo as the pervy Mr Gort, with the wonderful Avice Landon in her last film role as his snooty wife. There are appearances by many other prominent British performers, including: The all-female pipe band is already skirling in the theatre foyer below. Bazza has lost his awfulness, with time and the transfer, and become over-fond folklore. Barry Crocker plays him as a walking accident. The deadpan feeling of the comic strip has become all vulnerable, big-eyed and ingenuous. Kangaroo Valley as Snake Gully. Auntie Edna Everage is something else. Ahse also wins on costume. Bazza is not built for change - just a certain sort of audience identification. And the moment they were all waiting for was the Chunder. It was almost as if they could sniff it coming. The lead-in is a fight in the Arts Freedom Factory. Bazza is triumphant when the uniformed bodyguard of the shady entrepreneur, Maurie Miller with no apologies to you know who, steps in. Down he goes - into a sepia nightmare about being stabbed by Abos in the Simpson. And in the audience, the murmurs start: Is he going to do it? He has to wake up straitjacketed in hospital first to see Humphries again. This time as the psychiatrist Dr De Lamphrey, he is unwise enough to get down on all fours to see why Bazza is studying the carpet so intently. And as he crawls closer, it happens - in a lumpy, full-colour close-up that sends a great orgasmic sigh echoing through the house. The film has the one-dimensional, Carry On look of being shot in a harsh light - reminder of its comic strip beginnings. Episodically structured, improbably connected, the film has a farcical structure in which narrative is clearly at the service of set piece performances by Barry Crocker Bazza, Barry Humphreys Edna Everage and other roles, Spike Milligan and Peter Cook.
