An essay collection that includes these writers â€” edited by Cheryl Strayed, no less â€” almost promises to be nothing less than stellar. And The Best American Essays delivers. As in every anthology, some essays warranted more than one read, while others were skipped, and then read when the rest of the book was finished. But as a whole, this collection is sharp, compelling, and diverse. It was a gentle reminder of the silent stories everyone carries around with them, and the connections we can make. The suicidal man shows Sampsell a picture of his daughter before he is taken to the hospital. Months later, mired in his own blackness and suicidal fog, Sampsell reaches out to his son and decides to live. Here, the beauty and blood coexist, along with the pain and pleasure, the ambivalence and admiration. She struggles to explain life after loss. Birth and death weave throughout the book, creating a tapestry that links the essays together and makes the collection feel cohesive and complete. Decades later, she explores memory and fact to see which, if any, prove to be true. This was the fourth essay listed, but the first one I read, having read her novel Zazen. When I finished, I had to put the book down. It is almost unfair to put this essay alongside any others; her prose is electric and the story completely compelling. I happily read it again, and I actually think I prefer her nonfiction to her short stories. Throughout each story is the need to be loved, the need for someone else to understand us â€” anyone, even for a moment. Sometimes you find it. A pow and a wow. An ouch and a yes. A stop and a goâ€¦. I think the stories are best read out of order; read them in the order to which you feel drawn â€” the beauty of this particular collection is the fluidity of the pieces, and they will likely be read more than once, anyway. This series consistently showcases what an exceptional essay should be, and the collection does not disappoint.

2: Review: The Best American Essays - Columbia Journal

The Best American Essays series is one of the best things that is happening in the already exciting area of creative nonfiction. The issue edited by Cheryl Strayed didn't disappoint. I am thinking of purchasing all, or most, of the volumes I don't yet own.

Add a personal message: Invalid E-mail address Sending your article Last year around this time I mentioned my fondness for the annually appearing Best American Essays and my particular pleasure in noting that, each year, more and more of the essays in this anthology address medical topics. Eight out of twenty-four of the essays selected for inclusion last year dealt with illness or the body. Mental illness is a particularly common subject, as is pregnancy. Happy reading--and happy holidays! The winner of the Nobel Prize in literature recalls a childhood bout with appendicitis which aroused deep feelings of sibling conflict. A woman wonders if the creepy truck driver who picked her up when she was hitch hiking in the s was actually a psychopathic serial killer on the loose then. Okay, maybe a stretch to call this medical When a customer threatens suicide, a bookstore worker re-examines his own life. A woman recalls her evaluation by a school psychologist at age eight. A physician treats the wounded in Iraq. An accident during a limo ride to the airport provides a violent preview of death. A young teacher and mother writes of the pregnant teens in her community. A man recalls his childhood during the golden age of boxing in the s, and a boxer who died in the ring from a blood clot on the brain. A meditation on hair loss during cancer therapy. A woman struggling with post-partum depression finds a surprising source of comfort: Deadkidistan" by Michelle Mirsky. At sixty-one a man revisits the encyclopedia he read as a child, as well as the letters of his mother, who committed suicide when he was twelve. This blog is not written or edited by Boston.
