Next Sex, power, loneliness, farts. Texting, abortion, Iraq, nuclear power, fire hydrants, Romulus and Remus, agnosticism, and the pop-up button on a frozen turkey. He sees his life in cartoons, too. Just funny, endearing scenes, like his friends splashing around on the brick porch of his house in Dogtown after his mother rolled blankets to seal the stairway and filled the porch with three feet of water to improvise a pool. She was the first lady of St. Louis television, musical, bubbly, and willing to do anything to make the crowd laugh. She loved her fans: His father was a traveling salesman, so unfortunately, he was gone a lot. One Fourth of July, she dressed Mike and his cousins in old, torn clothes, smudged dirt on their faces, reminded them to call her Mrs. Peters, and called the Forest Park Highlands amusement park: At Christmas, she sewed Mike the perfect Superman suit, and he wore it to St. James the Greater School underneath his uniform jacket, shirt, and tie. He got sent home for leaping off of a urinal onto an unsuspecting janitor. Mike loved going to movies, and he perfected a technique for getting in free: Mike was never big on schoolwork, but he was a sweet kid, an altar boy at St. James the Greater Church. Mike loved dogs, and he loved that he lived in Dogtown. He just sort of got dogs: He wondered if maybe he was a dog once, in a previous life! Across the living room, the phone rang. His mother talked fast; he had to keep up. Whatever the reason, words jammed in the back of his throat like a car pileup on the freeway. Afterward, Bruce saw him on the playground, all by himself, sketching. By the time recess ended, Mike had a future career and a lifelong friendship, both born of Oswald the Lucky Rabbit. When Mike was 10, his family moved to Webster Groves, to a striking modernist house with a real swimming pool, not a filled-up front porch. He got in trouble regularly; the words of the curriculum bent into meaningless squiggles, and the military discipline was lost on him. Our Lady of Armageddon. He fell to his knees in the chapel and promised God he would not cheat once in his senior year if God passed him. Marian Peters remembers it a little differently. Cute, but a little entitled. They were ready for his Calvinist objections. Mike was still convinced, though, that the dean was lining up engineering students for his daughter to date as soon as the unsuitable, stammering young cartoonist flunked out of college. Junior year, the dean said he could no longer take summer school to finish up his courses. He panicked and sought counsel from his favorite professor, who stroked his chin and thought a minute. When you go into all your classes, just do cartoons. When you go into figure-drawing class, do the figures in exaggerated, cartoon style. When you go to painting class, paint cartoons. The grade report came, and he opened the envelope with shaking fingers. Mike and Marian both graduated in May. Marian already had a teaching job in Chicago, starting in the fall, and Mike had a job lined up with the Chicago Daily News. They planned their wedding for August. The only way all of their parents would attend was if both a priest and a minister officiated, so they got a special dispensation from Rome. The article, just a one-pager, was about the Archdiocese of St. Marian and Mike phoned all their guests and explained that the lovely engraved invitation was null and void. They went to Chicago to take their jobs. The car screeched to a halt. A tire had blown. It felt like an epiphany. We change the tire, then we go have fun. With that, the tone for their marriage was set. In , Mike was drafted. Marian went with him to Okinawa, Japan, where he worked as an artist for the U. When he was discharged, he went back to the Daily News. His mentor, Bill Mauldin—a St. Bespectacled, Mike wore a coat and tie to his new job. One day it hit him: He was now officially a mild-mannered cartoonist. He put on the Superman suit Marian had bought him for Halloween and wore it to the next editorial meeting, arriving early and climbing out on a ledge so he could make his entrance: I ran into lousy weather over Cleveland. After it was published, the astronauts asked for a copy. I left my English term paper in my room. Bring it down as fast as you can! In , Mike decided that he should stop trying to win big prizes and just draw stuff that made him laugh. In , he won the Pulitzer Prize for editorial cartooning. That spring, Our Lady of Armageddon invited Mike back to speak. CBC wanted him in its Hall of Fame. Pickled tink, he started paging through his old high-school yearbooks for inspiration; maybe he could do a few cartoons for the occasion. In the senior yearbook, he found a note from

Mr. Morgan, his English teacher: He crunched them nervously, one handful after another, whenever he had to think up an idea. And in , he needed a lot of ideas: His doctor kept lecturing him about high cholesterol, so he tried a trick: He came up licking salt and grease from his fingers. He was the dog. A bleeding-heart liberal, he tried hard, during the Reagan years, to draw President Ronald Reagan as mean, but it never worked. Watt was fun to draw, too, because you knew that he was conniving. You know he thinks about things. Paul Conrad, he was a fabulously mean, angry cartoonist. Herblock [Herb Block], when he got into his office at The Washington Post, you would hear him breathing like Darth Vader, and he would do wonderfully vicious cartoons. The only reason people would ever take the time to come back and look at my work is if it made them laugh. He was once threatened with the bill for FedExing his late cartoon to hundreds of newspapers. And one day, when he was really behind and fiddling, Marian walked into his office, took out a dollar bill, and calmly set it on fire. He plugs his laptop into the outlet in the undersink cabinet. The Colorado house has thick forest-green carpet on the floor, not hard, cold ceramic tile like the Orlando, Fla. It might take three days of two-hour sessions in the sensory-deprivation tank of his bathroom before a single good idea emerges. When he started this ritual, his housekeeper worried for weeks: She was used to him working on his editorial cartoons out at the wooden drawing board with the TV going constantly: But the comic strip was different, personal. It had to come from within. Why do you think they call them Munchkins? He learned how to laugh through anger or upset as a kid, and the lessons left him gentle. In the early days, Mike dipped pen in ink. Then hard-tip felt pens came out. Then he went to brushes; he still uses brush pens with cartridges. Every time he wants one, he has to look through all of them to find it. Near the drawing table, he has a copy machine, so he can draw things small and blow them up or draw them big and shrink them. His Pulitzer is here. Once he was in a mall in D. It was the best feeling in the world! I think about that lady when I do a cartoon:
