The band produced a few cassette tape demos. In addition to some original songs, their repertoire included upbeat covers of "Gloria" and "The Battle Hymn of the Republic". The group added guitarist and football player Chan Kinchla. Although he was a promising athlete, Kinchla decided to commit to playing music instead after a knee injury. Popper met bassist Bobby Sheehan and the two became good friends, with Sheehan becoming the new bass player for Blues Band in . A black cat happened to be nearby, and the group took this as a sign and adopted the Black Cat as their mascot figure. The group changed their name to Blues Traveler, taking the latter part from the name of the primary demon in the film Ghostbusters, Gozer the Traveler. After much encouragement by friend and founding member of Mudhoney, David Gonzales, Blues Traveler began playing gigs along the New York-area club circuit, sometimes nightly; [2] the most prominent contract was playing Wednesday nights at a club called the Wetlands. By all members had dropped out of college classes. Blues Traveler then started a relentless touring schedule, expanding their reach up and down the east coast.
