Buffer Shares Note from Mack: The goal of this post was to provide helpful advice for others, especially my many friends in consulting that were curious about the entire process of writing their own book. I work as a digital and content strategist to help companies with their content and digital marketing as well as helping them build programs that better connect my client with their customers. These can include blogger or influencer outreach or brand ambassador programs. Thanks for reading and good luck with your writing! How long did it take? How do they get started? And yes, how much money can they make? I wanted to address the money part here, because again, I believe there are some big misconceptions. There are three ways that an author makes money directly from their book: Now there is a big qualification to this number. Some publishers will offer you that rate off list price Gross royalties, and some will offer you that rate off the amount of profit they make off the book net royalties. From my experience talking to other authors and receiving multiple contract offers for Think Like A Rock Star, it seems that most publishers in this space prefer to offer net royalties. Additionally, you will likely get a higher royalty rate for ebooks, plus you may be offered a higher royalty rate as your sales of the book increase. You should ask the publisher for both. Thus the averages say that you will never make a penny from royalties off sales of your book earn out. The average US non-fiction book sells about 100,000 copies a year and around 3,000,000 copies over its lifetime. So how long does it take to write a book? Publishers vary in how long they will give you to write a book. One of the reasons I decided to go with McGraw-Hill was because they were willing to give me a bit more time to write TLARS, I actually ended up getting about 6 months to work on the writing until we moved to the editing process. All told, the editing and writing of Think Like a Rock Star took nine months. The amount of your advance will not come close to covering the amount of time it will take you to write the book. So this brings up the obvious question: When are you going to find time to write this book? If you already have a full-time job, then your nights and weekends are probably going to disappear for a few months. If you work for yourself as I do, then you may have to make the tough decision to turn down some work in order to work on your book. Which is what I decided to do. Now another option is to bring on a co-author. This halves the work for you, but of course it also halves the amount of the advance you get, and the amount you make from any royalties in the future. But wait, what about marketing and promoting the book? Yep, after the writing and editing is done really it starts months before that, you then have to start marketing and promoting the book. One thing I wanted to touch on is the quest to hit the bestseller lists that a lot of authors get excited about when writing a book. The idea is this: If you can sell enough copies of the book in one week typically launch week is your best bet, then the book may qualify for bestseller lists. How many copies you need to sell is a very vague and floating number, and can depend on several factors such as what other books are coming out during the same week. In general it seems that at least 20,000 copies sold during one week is needed. This is where I really screwed up. So what I started doing last year was speaking and working in exchange for pre-orders! My thinking was this: Unfortunately, it turns out I was dead wrong about how Amazon calculates sales. The research on all of this seemed to be unclear about a few things, and one of them was how Amazon handles bulk sales. For example, if you pre-order copies of my book, Amazon will view it as if you only pre-ordered ONE copy, since the order is being placed on ONE credit card. If the pre-orders had each been counted as individual sales, the sales rank for the book would have likely been around 100 or less on launch. Which would have driven many additional sales because it would have been featured far more prominently on the site, on the hot new releases lists, etc etc. But live and learn. The main reason I wanted to talk about trying to make the bestseller list is that it is really hard to do on your first book unless you have a huge promotional platform. So then why in the world would anyone want to write a book? You write a book because you have an idea that you are passionate about, that you want to share with the world. If others find value in that idea, then you can make money indirectly off your book. I wrote Think Like a Rock Star because I wanted brands to learn how they could better create happy customers by learning how to be better marketers from rock stars. But in reality, I think the best way to approach writing a book is that you want to create something of value for others that will enable them to do something positive. A book that will be a tool for them to help them reach their goals and have greater accomplishments. If you can do all that, then the money will take care of itself. Getting some comments from others pointing out how a book gives you credibility and builds your awareness and how THAT leads to money for you. All of this is completely correct BUT how you position your book is crucial. If you are writing your book and at the same time thinking about how it will lead to bigger speaking fees and higher consulting rates for you, then it can easily impact your writing. So write the book that helps the reader kick-ass at whatever they are doing, like creating healthy meals for busy moms, or helping companies create amazing brand ambassador programs and the money will take care of itself!
