In the media area, I am continuing my work on Demographic Change and the Media. The research questions I am pursuing in this area are the following: Is there a dissonance between what is reflected in our popular media and our changing demographic reality? To what extent is the media that we export world-wide reflective of these demographic changes? In other words, do they present an accurate view of the U. I am also working with a group that is composed of researchers in Germany, and Latinos from the US and Mexico on a project entitled "Latino Images for the 21st Century. This law remained in effect until the s, although its enforcement was tightened in the late nineteenth century regarding Asian immigrants, and by the Johnson-Reed act of imposing immigration quotas. In short, until late in the twentieth century, only immigrants of the White "race" could hope to become naturalized citizens. The people of Puerto Rico were declared U. Since this law was the result of Congressional legislation, and not the result of an amendment to the United States Constitution , the current U. Puerto Ricans and other U. Constitution to admitted states and the District of Columbia through the Electoral College system. Nevertheless, both the Democratic Party and Republican Party , while not fielding candidates for public office in Puerto Rico, provide the islands with state-sized voting delegations at their presidential nominating conventions. Delegate selection processes frequently have resulted in presidential primaries being held in Puerto Rico. Citizens residing in Puerto Rico do not elect U. Representatives or Senators , however, Puerto Rico is represented in the House of Representatives by an elected representative commonly known as the Resident Commissioner , who has the same duties and obligations as a representative, with the exception of being able to cast votes on the final disposition of legislation on the House floor. The Resident Commissioner is elected by Puerto Ricans to a four-year term and does serve on congressional committee. Puerto Ricans residing in the U. Puerto Ricans have fully participated in all U. In order to be eligible, applicants must have been born in Puerto Rico; born outside of Puerto Rico to a Puerto Rican-born parent; or be an American citizen with at least one year residence in Puerto Rico. The citizenship is internationally recognized by Spain, which considers Puerto Rico to be an Ibero-American nation. Therefore, Puerto Rican citizens have the ability to apply for Spanish citizenship after only two years residency in Spain instead of the standard 10 years. Decolonization and status referendums Since , the UN has been considering the political status of Puerto Rico and how to assist it in achieving "independence" or "decolonization". More specifically, the group called on the United States to expedite a process that would allow the people of Puerto Rico to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence. The fourth, the Puerto Rican status referendum, occurred on November 6, Of votes for new status, a In all earlier referenda, votes for statehood were matched almost equally by votes for remaining an American territory, with the remainder for independence. The latter is currently prohibited.
