British Airways customers have supported more than 26 projects so far, impacting the lives of , people and resulting in community benefits of over Â£ million. From schools in the UK to sustainable agriculture projects in Kenya, all of the projects provide vital support to local communities and reduce carbon emissions.

This is bad news for the planet. We urgently need a more circular economy to reduce both raw resource use and waste. Why dump waste when it could be turned into food or other valuable products? Cardiff-based Get Wonky wants to end the waste. They turn misshapen strawberries and odd-shaped apples into additive-free juices. Supermarkets are cottoning on to the idea as well: It avoids many of the harmful environmental impacts or ethical concerns of conventional leather. Leather alternatives for vegans “ shoe shopping can be a nightmare. All in One Fish and Chips? Wild fish stocks are under immense pressure from overfishing. Even farmed fish add to the problem, because they are often fed on wild fish. SeaChips makes crisps from salmon skin offcuts that would otherwise go to waste. Can Food Packaging be Circular Too? Black plastic used for ready meals often ends up in landfill along with other non-recyclable materials. But Swindon-based Recycling Technologies hopes to change that. They have devised a process which breaks down mixed plastics into smaller molecules. These are then turned into useful industrial oils and waxes. One day they might be able to recycle plastic from landfill sites or even sweep up plastic from the oceans. What About the Scourge of Plastic Bottles? Plastic bottles are a huge environmental problem. Around the world, one million plastic bottles are bought every minute. This is because there is so much plastic in the oceans that fish eat it “ and then we eat the fish. But design firm Pentatonic , based in London and Berlin, is making beautifully crafted products from that waste. Plastic bottles are turned into cushions, wallets and chairs. Old smartphone screens into elegant glassware and even cigarette butts into jewellery. Each component is made from one material, so that it can be easily recycled at the end of its life. Another business recycling plastic bottles is Berkshire-based perPETual. They turn plastic bottles into yarn, which can then be made into different fabrics. Sweet Circular Economy Food Initiatives When sugar beet is processed to make sugar, the leftover pulp often goes to waste. CelluComp , based in Fife, has a better idea. The cellulose fibres in the product give it all sorts of useful properties. Useful Circular Economy Resources Have you been inspired by these circular economy food initiatives? 2: British group launches initiative to make EU citizenship permanent - Europe Street News

The British-American Book AWARENESS Initiative is designed to develop AWARENESS of U.K. publishers and their current and forthcoming titles across the U.S.

Their goal is to shorten the time and increase the effectiveness of a military response in the framework of NATO, EU or coalitions of the willing to threats from different directions. The Rationale of JEF and E2I The Joint Expeditionary Force was launched in and is tasked with conducting a full spectrum of operations, including participation in high-intensity conflicts. The initiative provides Nordic and Baltic countries with an additional crisis response tool that can be used for NATO, EU or coalition of the willing purposes. JEF is also of political significance. Through this initiative, the United Kingdom, which has the greatest military potential in Europe alongside France, demonstrates its readiness to support its allies should they be threatened. The concept reflects the French vision of European strategic autonomy. Its long-term goal is to build among European countries a sense of responsibility for the southern neighbourhood, and to provide them with the capability to conduct independent missions outside their own territories. Unlike JEF, the French proposal does not assume the creation of a joint multinational force. This should create favourable political and operational conditions for timely crisis response operations. The E2I emphasis is on missions outside Europe. It does not refer directly to collective defence, although states should be prepared to participate in the full spectrum of operations. They were to be the basic tool enabling crisis response and collective defence missions which also requires, for example, the rapid transfer of forces of high readiness to the territory of threatened states. However, NATO planning and Allied exercises focused almost exclusively on crisis response missions until Such missions required different doctrines and training from those required for defensive operations. The EU also focused on crisis response and built its own rapid reaction Battle Groups each consisting of 1, to 2, personnel exclusively for the needs of expeditionary operations. They also enforced some level of equipment modernisation and ensured that Allies kept some forces in a state of high readiness. However, the escalation of threats from the southern neighbourhood and from Russia since have shown that European countries have too few well-armed forces in a state of high readiness. Therefore, in the last four years, NATO and the EU have taken initiatives to increase the European ability to engage in the most demanding missions, including combat operations. The PESCO mechanism has also been launched in the EU, under which 25 countries have committed themselves to the regular formation of Battle Groups and launch of projects that enhance the interoperability of their armed forces. The French and British initiatives aim above all to provide an additional format of cooperation that will increase the ability to respond to threats. In this way, European states will have access to an additional tool in the event of paralysis in the decision-making process of NATO or the EU. As the nuclear powers are involved in both initiatives, Russia will find it more difficult to apply nuclear blackmail, for example to stop the deployment of troops in an escalating crisis. Flexible capabilities to respond to different threats to NATO and EU countries will also strengthen the political coherence of both organisations and their importance in U. Multinational forces that can be used on the territories of NATO and EU border states, irrespective of complicated decision-making in both organisations, will significantly increase the possibility of taking action in the Nordic and Baltic regions, complicating Russian calculations. Poland would also have greater influence on strengthening the political cohesion of NATO and the EU and would gain an additional tool to engage in missions and deepen political and military cooperation with the major Allies including the U.
