Full results But in UK elections this result does not automatically trigger another election. Instead, the party with the largest number of seats -- in this case, it looks like the Conservatives -- will attempt to form a coalition government with one of the smaller parties. Read More The second-largest party -- which would be Labour -- can also start parallel talks to try to form a coalition of its own in an effort to reach the magic number of 326. If no-one can reach a deal, a party could try form a minority government, but it would struggle to pass laws in parliament. There will be a sense of urgency to the coalition talks to form a new British government because the Brexit clock is ticking: Without a stable government in place, it will be impossible to start Brexit talks and they will have to be delayed. If the hung parliament is confirmed, what happens next? If, as looks likely, the Conservatives end up with the largest number of seats, they get to go first in trying to form a government by going into coalition with other parties. But before the talks can start, there will be widespread anger across the Conservative Party that she has thrown away a majority for the sake of an unnecessary early election. So there will be moves against her and MPs could call on her to stand down. However, many Conservatives will not want to appear disunited when there is already uncertainty about what the new government will look like, which could blunt any possible challenge. The first 24 hours: Latest updates This could be undertaken in a formal coalition or an informal arrangement known as confidence and supply, where a smaller party agrees to back the larger partner in crucial votes in return for policies but does not take ministerial seats. If the result is tight, or if the popular vote gives a different winner to the tally of seats, as much will depend on fixing a narrative in the early stages as straightforward math. Which leader can assert authority over the way the results have fallen, and who can stake a claim to form a government? This could see separate statements by May and Labour leader Jeremy Corbyn to the media in the early hours of Friday each declaring they have a moral mandate to lead the country. The Conservatives were the largest party but the sitting Labour prime minister, Gordon Brown, stayed in Downing Street while backroom negotiations got under way over the Saturday and Sunday following polling day on the Thursday. This is when the real action takes place: In 2010, that was the Liberal Democrats. This time, the Lib Dems are more left-wing and are vociferously anti-Brexit, so are more likely to side with Labour. Even if Labour have fewer seats than the Conservatives, they have more choice in prospective coalition partners, so could be more likely to form a "progressive alliance". The SNP has said it will not enter a formal coalition with Labour but could support them through confidence and supply. There is no strict timetable for coalition talks to follow, and in 2010, an agreement was not reached until the following Tuesday, five days on from the election. But if May has not secured a deal with another party by Monday morning, there will be pressure on her to call off the talks, particularly if Labour can show it can form a coalition with other parties to form a working majority and send Corbyn into Downing Street as Prime Minister. At that point, one of the leaders would have to show they could form a minority government that had the support of other parties. But this is a scenario wished by almost no one in Westminster.
