Broster was a phenomenal writer of short horror stories. I absolutely love these tales and found they hold up strong even today. They receive my highest possible recommendation. Dorothy Kathleen Broster was born in England in 1864. She was a novelist and short story writer who wrote under the name D. She worked as a Red Cross nurse during World War I and wrote a number of successful historical novels. Here we will be looking at some of her fantastic supernatural short stories. I particularly enjoy some of the dream images described within. Then he hears that another woman has also returned from the steep deep. Are both women separate parts of the same person, and how did she survive such certain death? This is a fantastic weird tale. When he realizes one of the girls playing with his children seems to be clairvoyant psychic, he tries to use her abilities to obtain the information. The serene, everyday start of this excellent tale is sharply contrasted by its violent, bloody conclusion. This is my favorite D. He puts off seeing the house as he enlists to fight alongside her brother for the French when the war begins. On leave one day, he goes to the manor alone. It has a beautiful room with a large window looking out on the sunset. This is another fantastic ghost story by Broster. The wife opens up the lower level as a tea shop to help their strained finances. An old man begins showing up asking to be allowed inside to pick up a chest. Eventually, after strange things begin happening inside the house and they lose their servants, the family is forced to seek a way to banish the specter who sometimes appears as an old man and sometimes as a young one. This is a great, longer tale by Broster. Birling died a few years back. Article by Matt Cowan.

7: COUCHING AT THE DOOR - D.K. Broster | Delfi knjigare | Sve dobre knjige na jednom mestu

The title story Couching at the Door hit me harder than many of the works of much more famous authors of ghost and horror stories. The horror in this story is one's own horror, a creation of one's own sins, and the more one fights it, the more one tries to pawn it off on others, the more the horror grows.
