For courses in multicultural education or multicultural curriculum, and elementary, secondary and K methods courses. Its authentic cases offer opportunities for analysis on several levels and are sufficiently complex so as to invite multiple interpretations. They present examples of everyday situations involving gender, ethnicity, race, religion, language, affectional orientation, socioeconomic status, parents, and community. The cases involve classroom issues that are relevant to all grade levels and all content areas, allowing instructors significant flexibility in their use. Glossary of selected terms-has been added to assist in discussing issues embedded in the cases. Exploration of new topics within cases - including profanity, mental health issues such as anxiety and depression, sexually explicit dress, responses to terrorism, and immigrant and refugee status through "Questions for Reflection". Retention and Updates of Best Cases-- Based on analysis of ratings of over students in an urban-based preservice teacher education program, only the highest-rated cases have been preserved in each part. Broader View of Instructional Level. Updated Print and Internet Resources - provide preservice teachers with the most current research and best practice in the profession. Reorganization of cases to begin with gender issues-Contains issues to which students have a personal connection. Starts students off with issues that relate to students in more familiar gender-based ways. A Race section comprising five cases-Combines race-issue cases from the first edition with three new race-specific cases. Encourages students to explore how race relates to issues of ethnicity and national origin-helps students see how race is similar to, and different from, these other factors. Planning for Religious Diversity: Introduces future teachers to challenges and opportunities offered by this growing segment of the American population. Outlines guidelines for creating additional context in one section of the text-using them is easier, and the adaptability of each case to numerous teaching outcomes is made more obvious. At the end of each part a new section entitled Design Your Own Case -gives teachers the opportunity to further explore the diversity issues in that part. Invites teachers to explore diversity issues more deeply and broadly by developing their own cases for analysis. Questions for Reflection and Activities for Extending Thinking appear after every case. Provides instructors with ideas for in-class discussions or assignments-focuses students on self-reflection, application and further study. Consistent pedagogical structure for cases-Brief beginning overview, a concise story that illustrates at least one diversity issue, and ending questions and activities. Sets the stage for readers, then draws them in, and encourages analysis and discussion. Extensive bibliographical material-Includes selected bibliographies after each of the ten major diversity domain sections, plus a general bibliography at text end. Bridges the gap between what students learn from the cases and what else they may want or need to know. List of websites at the end of each major diversity domain section. Links students to relevant, reliable information pertinent to the issues addressed in the cases. Serves as additional resources for instructors and students alike. New to this Edition NEW!
