Catalogus of Henry de Kirkestede Vol Corpus of British Medieval Library Catalogues (British Library - Corpus of British Medieval Library Catalogues) by Editor-R.H. Rouse; Editor-M.A. Rouse. British Library,

In he immigrated to Canada with his brother William, and by had opened a book and stationery store in Toronto. He indulged his fondness for sports, literature, and music, joining the Toronto Cricket Club, the Shakespeare Club immediate forerunner of the Toronto Literary Club , and an amateur musical society. He went to the races, to an exhibition of the Toronto Horticultural Society, and to the Theatre Royal when it opened in Henry was also a charter member in of the Toronto Board of Trade, of which he became secretary, and of the Toronto Building Society. He also took an active interest in the House of Industry, serving for some time as secretary and treasurer. In the politics of the pre-rebellion period Rowsell was a strong supporter of the Tory group in Upper Canada. He also published in October The speeches, messages, and replies of His Excellency Sir Francis Bond Head, which he dedicated to the lieutenant governor. The pamphlet was printed at the press of the Patriot, but shortly thereafter, Henry and William opened a printing office, H. A branch library and bookshop was established in Kingston probably in the late s and it lasted until about Rowsell devoted his attention largely to bookselling while his partners managed the printing and publishing end of the business. By about the firm was for a short time the most important publishing house in Canada West. It published a constant flow of pamphlets, tracts, annual reports, almanacs, directories, music books, school and university texts, legal and medical works, and books of general interest. As Rowsell and Ellis, the firm, while continuing as publisher to the Toronto synod of the Church of England, specialized in legal publications, including the Upper Canada law and equity reports. Publishing seems always, however, to have been a secondary interest for Henry Rowsell who was primarily a bookseller. He was intent on making his bookstore the best in Toronto, and it became the favourite rendezvous of writers, scholars, sportsmen, and professional men, who were attracted not only by the large and varied stock but also by the courteous manner, wide book knowledge, and public spirit of the proprietor. At this period a publisher could build up sufficient capital to extend his publishing activity either by entering the wholesale book and stationery distribution business or by obtaining lucrative government printing contracts. Rowsell elected to stay in the retail book business. In addition to books, he regularly sold lithographic maps, prints, and pictures, and occasionally held art exhibits in his store. Rowsell published at least seven catalogues of his bookstock, advertising a wide range of books both general and specialized from British, American, and Canadian publishers. Henry Rowsell retired in , and for the next decade lived in seclusion in Toronto. Increasing deafness and loss of eyesight prevented him from taking part in the social activities which, like his business concerns, had won him respect. From until his own death in , Henry Hutchison carried on the retail store and publishing house as Rowsell and Hutchison. Much of the diary was published in F. Walker, Sketches of old Toronto Toronto, Another diary, concerning mainly a trip to England in 1833, is held by UWO. Samuel Thompson, Reminiscences of a Canadian pioneer for the last fifty years: Toronto and Montreal, , includes information on the Rowsell brothers, and there is a brief but inaccurate biographical sketch in Landmarks of Canada; what art has done for Canadian history. Many Rowsell imprints can be found in Biblio.

In the middle years of the fourteenth century, the monk Henry de Kirkestede, librarian and later prior of Bury St Edmunds abbey, set about compiling a universal bibliography of writers and their works. His sources were extensive.

The thousands of surviving ninth-century manuscripts are the most substantial witnesses to that revival. The image they convey, however, is fragmented and multi-faceted, both because they represent only a fraction of all books produced in the ninth century, and because every manuscript reflects the particular conditions, time and place of its production and the individual choices made by its compilers, copyists and decorators. This varied image is one manifestation of the diversity characterizing the Carolingian reform efforts, to which modern scholars have drawn attention in recent decades. Cambridge, Pembroke College, MS is a modest ninth-century compendium of patristic texts, containing six mainly doctrinal works: I should also like to thank Dr Teresa Webber, who has seen many rough drafts of this article, for her invaluable comments and advice. All remaining errors and naiveties are naturally my own. Mordek, Kirchenrecht und Reform im Frankenreich: Schwartz ; 2nd edn. In this article I propose to study Cambridge, Pembroke College MS as a material witness to the revival of learning in the ninth century, and instruction in the writings of the Fathers in particular. I shall explore the palaeographical and codicological features of this small and unassuming ninth-century manuscript, as well as the combination of texts and their intended use in order to explain its place within ninth-century traditions of learning. It is with a brief description of the background of these traditions that I should like to begin. Furthermore, schools were to be set up in every monastic and episcopal 4 Pelagius, Libellus fidei Pelagii ad Innocentium ab ipso missus, zosimo redditus, PL, 45, " Mountain, CCSL, 50, "5. The preface on fo. Praefatio incerti auctoris, PL, 62, "80B. Leipzig, , ii. Admonitio generalis, in Capitularia regum francorum, 2 vols, ed. Modern scholarship on Carolingian education has paid much attention to this foundation of liberal arts. Instead, modern scholars have approached the subject of Carolingian doctrine and theology by focusing either on individual scholars, such as Alcuin and John Scottus Eriugena, or on particular doctrinal controversies. Unity of doctrine was necessary to achieve the pax catholica, which the Carolingians claimed could only be guaranteed by a universal church, expressing the true faith in the correct worship of the church. Instruction in the writings of the Fathers was challenged by the absence of a uniform, agreed corpus of patristic texts and the uneven dissemination of many texts, so that works available to some could be unknown to others. The pseudo-Gelasian Decretum, widely diffused during the ninth century, listed the names of writers deemed orthodox or not orthodox, but did not 10 Ibid. In several ninth-century letters we find masters trying to obtain relevant works of the Fathers of which they had heard but which they had not read. Furthermore, the works of the Fathers themselves do not form a monolithic whole and are not always consistent with each other. Ninth-century scholars were very much aware of these difficulties and there was clearly an interest in attributing texts correctly and determining their orthodoxy. Milde, Der Bibliothekskatalog des Klosters Murbach aus dem 9. McKitterick, The Carolingians and the written word Cambridge, , " Wallace-Hadrill, The Frankish church Oxford, , ; Carolingian readers were furthermore wont to annotate manuscripts with headings and notae to indicate passages thought suitable to reproduce in an argument, see D. A bishop could recommend inclusion of a difficult tract on the Trinity as appropriate for one priest, yet recommend simpler, less demanding texts on the Trinity for another. I, 78"9, at Admonitio generalis 59, and the Epistola de litteris colendis, which includes monasteries and is addressed to arch bishops and abbots. In this article I follow the latter numbering. The binding is nineteenth-century with three paper flyleaves at the front and the rear of the manuscript and two parchment flyleaves preceding folio 1. The folios are of good quality thick parchment, in quires mainly of eight leaves, with drypoint ruling of 18 lines with double vertical bounding lines. Quire 9, containing the ending of the pseudo-Augustinian prayer, the short text attributed to Prosper and a preface to the pseudo- Athanasian Disputatio, is of thinner parchment and has 18"24 ruled lines. The verso side of the last folio, covered with linen, has scribbles on it. Waitz MGH; Hannover, , 45", at 62"4. London, , i. I am grateful to Dr Teresa Webber for this observation. University of Cambridge, , i. The use of the variant letter forms increases in the course of the individual writing stints. The incipits of the Justinian edict on folio 1r and the Disputatio on folio 59r correspond with quire openings. The first 7 lines of folio 1 are written in red uncial letters, while the Disputatio opens with a full, though uncoloured, display page with the title in square capitals and the opening of the text in rustic capitals. The order of the manuscript seems to have been altered at an early stage. The last eight quires fos. The display page for the opening of the Disputatio further suggests that this text was once intended to be the first of the manuscript. Quire 9, with atypical ruling and thinner parchment, seems to have been intended to join the two parts, confirmed by the presence of a preface to the Disputatio on folio 58v. Minns, A descriptive catalogue of the manuscripts in the library of Pembroke College, Cambridge, with a hand list of the printed books to the year Cambridge, , The many variant letterforms, furthermore, seem to rule out a date in the late ninth century. The manuscript is a small workmanlike volume, with a minimum of decoration or embellishment. The modesty, the changed order, the multitude of hands, as well as the irregular script indicate that it was intended as a utilitarian book. The form of the ligatures, the variant letterforms, and the fact that their use increases in the course of the stints, may suggest scribes who were not so much inexperienced, but whose formal Caroline minuscule bookhand was just one of the scripts they had mastered. On the verso side of the second parchment flyleaf a short list of contents is entered in the distinctive hand of Henry of Kirkstead, a monk and librarian at Bury from to Aachenâ€”Lambach Wiesbaden, , no. Gneuss, Handlist of Anglo-Saxon manuscripts: Catalogus de libris autenticis et apocrifis, ed. Augustine , no. Athanasius , K Pembroke College is featured under the heading Edictum piissimi imperatoris Iustiniani, the initial words of the title on folio 1r of Pembroke The text added by an eleventh-century continental hand on the flyleaves suggests that the manuscript was still on the continent at that time. He was a frequent traveller to the continent and doubtless brought books over to the abbey from St Denis and elsewhere, either as part of his personal collection or to expand his 32 R. Rouse and Rouse, Henry of Kirkestede. Turnhout, , i. If Baldwin played a role in the acquisition of Pembroke for Bury, this is of no assistance in identifying its place of origin. Alternatively, Pembroke may have been acquired via another English centre. Pembroke is a compendium of mostly pseudonymous doctrinal works, here attributed to the patristic authorities Justinian I, Jerome, Augustine, Prosper, Athanasius and Eusebius. The first text in the manuscript is the Edictum de recta fide, written by emperor Justinian I in the summer of , foreshadowing â€” and imposing â€” an end to the controversy of the Three Chapters and paving the way for the fifth ecumenical council. The first part is in essence an affirmation of 36 A. James, On the abbey of S. Edmund Cambridge Antiquarian Society, 28; Cambridge, , 12â€” The second part then proceeds to deflect all possible objections against the three threats. The Latin translation survives in only eight manuscripts and Eduard Schwartz used four for his edition. Schieffer concludes that although the extant Latin texts of the edict stem from a single Latin translation of the Greek text, none of the surviving recensions is directly connected to another. The Latin version of the edict De recta fide found its way into the most notorious ninth-century collection of canon law, the pseudo-Isidorian Decretales. The identity of the author or authors of the so-called pseudo- Isidorian forgeries has long been an enigma to modern scholars. The collection is thought to have been composed between and and to originate from the diocese of Rheims, where it played a role in the disputes on the metropolitan rights of archbishop Hincmar of Rheims. In another article Zechiel-Eckes even proposed abbot Paschasius Radbertus ob. In the accusation against the bishop of Laon read before the synod of Douzy in the archbishop repeated the same words. Hinschius Leipzig, , 50; Justinian I, Edictum de recta fide, l. Studia Gratiana, 19â€”20; Rome, , i. Justinian I, Edictum de recta fide, l. The three oldest extant witnesses of the edict De recta fide, including Pembroke , all seem to have been copied around the same time as the Pseudo-Isidorian forgeries, and probably not far removed from its place of origin. The Edictum is followed on folio 48r by the Libellus fidei, which reads like a declaration of faith, opening with credimus in deum patrem omnipotentem. In the course of the text the heresy of Arius is explicitly renounced, as are other unorthodoxies, such as those propagated by Sabellius, Apollinaris and Photinus. In the penultimate paragraph there is even a reference to the heresy of Pelagius, where the version printed in the Patrologia Latina has the name of Manichaeus instead. As such the letter seems to fit in well with the anti- heretical and doctrinal Edictum preceding it in this manuscript, but with greater emphasis on the doctrine of the Trinity and the heresies disagreeing with orthodoxy on this point. This focus on the doctrine of the Trinity is continued in the following text on folio 52v, the Oratio de Trinitate. Hincmar of Rheims, Opusculum LV capitulorum, ; cf. Justinian I, Edictum de recta fide, § 1. It was long thought to be a genuine work of Augustine, but this attribution is now very much doubted on linguistic grounds. These first and last sentences were used in chapter XIX of the pseudo-Augustine Speculum or Manuale on the Trinity, a dogmatic tract with an invocational character. At the bottom of the same folio the title of the following text, De fide, de spe et de caritate, is entered, ascribing it to Prosper. Modern cataloguers and scholars have habitually adopted this attribution. The last book gives a liturgical Ordo for penance, as well as a list of transgressions and their respective penalties. The combination of more general moral texts with doctrinal works, however, is common in other manuscripts. Paragraphs with an anti-heretical character could be used to prescribe expected moral behaviour and, conversely, authors of doctrinal and polemic works sometimes used moral texts to describe the immorality of their adversaries. Raymund Kottje discusses the debate at length and concludes that there are important arguments to suppose that the sixth book was also written by Halitgar, see R. On folio 63v, however, scribe C took over, using mixed capitals with some uncial letterforms for the rubrics, as opposed to the rustic capitals of the previous section. The tract is styled as a debate between Athanasius and Arius before judge Probus, a pagan with a desire to become Christian, who is unsure whether to choose Arianism or the orthodox faith.
