This is merely a coincidence that the default value and the current address match though. Passing from Docker Compose This is a setting that will change from environment to environment and so I think the best place to set it is in the compose file. These are what we use to share the data from one container to another, thereby making our Jenkins. Now that it is set, we should be able to write a groovy init script to read it. But first, we will have to restart Jenkins to pick up the new environment: Deploying our Groovy Jenkins Configs We now have a working script that will manage the URL of Jenkins in any environment that we would be deploying into simply by setting a variable in the compose file. Now we need to make this available to the master so that it can be executed on startup. To do that, we will add a director to the plugins image and then mount it into the master in a similar way to how the war and plugins work. Install our base set of plugins and their dependencies that are listed in plugins. We can now rebuild the image and pick up our new config that should hopefully configure the URL of our Jenkins on boot! Ahhhh, it was like that before? Modify the value in the compose file to something different and restart Jenkins: A typo you say? In addition, if you notice the difference between this set of commands and the one earlier, we seem to be drifting to chaos. Gooood, it does work: The URL in the management console has been updated to the new, wrong, custom value so we can confirm it works. This is done via the script added to init. This happens very often in our work lives and attending to little tech debts like this is critical to having quality software. I certainly encourage everyone to leave the code better than they found it and to refactor things when they see something turning into a turd like object. I also encourage you to make note of these things and take care of them after you are in a place to save game. Switching context between one problem and another can be very expensive mind and time wise so feel free to take a note, create a ticket or something, then finish what you are doing unless there is an actual issue that needs to be addressed before your code will work. When you submit your PR for review, then jump on that Jira and refactor your heart away. We need to do everything, but we can only do one thing at a time. Try to be aware of time management. That seems like it should be replaced by a shell script. Use the following command to watch the logs: Add that onto the branch with a good message and push, PR, merge, etc..
