Sports mascots in the United States and Native American mascot controversy As with college and professional football teams, most high school teams in every state have a mascot or team name. Many are generic allusions conveying an image sense of strength, speed, or bravery. Thus, pluralized team names such as Tigers, Eagles, Wildcats, Trojans, and Warriors are fairly common throughout the country. Other team names, however, have a historical connection to the town or area where the high school or school district is located, such as a locally important industry. Many new schools, or schools that had merged with other schools, have allowed their students to "vote" on a new school mascot or team nickname. There has also been a marked increase in recent years of web-based media covering high school sporting events. Many national media outlets have been producing national high school football rankings, including High School Football America, which has been releasing its Top 25 since . One example is the University Interscholastic League , which governs public school sports in Texas. The Sports Broadcasting Act of and Public Law , which govern the antitrust exemptions given to the National Football League , prohibit the broadcasting of NFL games within 75 miles of any high school football game on Friday nights between September and early December. These rules do not apply during preseason , when Friday night games are common, nor does it apply at the end of the season, though the only time regular season games are played on Friday in the NFL is on Christmas. Only recently have national sports television channels fully capitalized on this rule; since , the ESPN family of networks usually the sub-networks ESPN2 , ESPNU and online broadcaster ESPN3 , although the main channel also shows occasional games has aired regular season matchups between nationally ranked teams under the High School Showcase banner. Fox Sports 1 also included high school football in its lineup when it launched in . Also see Jock subculture

All the Right Moves â€” A film about a western Pennsylvania football player desperate to earn the scholarship that would enable him to escape his economically depressed town. American Dreams â€” "JJ" Pryor is a star high school football running back in the show, and many of the early episodes centered on his games. Quarterback Princess â€” starring Helen Hunt.
