The ghost played in Chicago." James finishes a full-court run with the high schoolers, his first time on the floor since the Finals, and lies on a training table to stretch his legs.

There is no more famous name in American crime history than Al Capone, the powerful mob leader who ruled Chicago through a haze of cigar smoke with an iron fist. Larger than life, Capone died in 1947, but some say his strong will and personality has carried on beyond the grave. Here are just a few of the places where it is claimed you might have an encounter with Alphonse Gabriel Capone—former gangster, bootlegger, racketeer, head of the Chicago Outfit, and potential wandering spirit. It was a sensational, sick story of violence that made the general public call for an end to mob violence. Capone himself was soon rounded up and sentenced for carrying a dangerous, concealed weapon. He was sentenced to serve time and spent 8 months at Eastern State Penitentiary from 1931 to 1933. Capone was provided with a lavishly furnished cell, complete with oriental rugs and a cabinet radio, but suffered in a different way. Stories say the ghost of Jimmy Clark continued to dog Capone after he was released from Eastern State, following him around to harass him. The penitentiary was also known for its cruel torture practices to inmates, such as dousing them with cold water in winter months, chaining their tongues to their wrists, and leaving them strapped tightly to chairs for extended periods of time. The prison was abandoned in 1933 and remains a favorite spot for paranormal investigators. Maribel, a town of about 100 people, is located in rural Wisconsin, which was a favorite hideout destination for many Chicagoland criminals. The eerie, fire scorched building developed into local urban legend. Teens daring each other to enter the allegedly supernatural location became a pastime for bored rural youth or adventure seekers on a road trip. Unfortunately, not much is left to see of the Hotel Hell. Only a small part of the building remains standing—a 90 mph windstorm destroyed most of the structure in 1957. Claims of activity here are quite substantial. One of the most interesting pieces of ghost evidence is a photo taken in the cemetery in Chicago by the group Ghost Research Society. Using infrared film, they captured what appears to be the ghost of a forlorn woman in a white dress, sitting on top of a headstone. Capone was shipped off on a prison railroad car to the Rock in 1933. After settling in, Capone filled his time by playing banjo in the prison band. He often practiced playing the banjo in the empty shower room. Tour guides and visitors have reported hearing a ghostly banjo twang in the shower room and from his cell B later renumbered B D-block is considered to be a hotspot for ghosts by several paranormal investigation teams. Suffering declining health from an untreated case of syphilis, Capone was transferred to the Federal Correctional Institute of Terminal Island before being released in 1939. He retired to Palm Island, Florida to live out the rest of his life. His final resting place, alongside other members of the Capone family, is the eerie Mount Carmel Cemetery. The grave is marked with a statue of a woman holding a bouquet of flowers on top of it. Porcelian photographs on the base of her tomb show Julia on her wedding day and again after she was exhumed. He is also the director of the Milwaukee Paranormal Conference.
