

1: China in What Hangs in the Balance? - Knowledge@Wharton

Aug 22, Â· The milestone, though anticipated, is the most striking evidence yet of China's ascendance and that the rest of the world will have to reckon with a new economic superpower.

Going back to the Nixon era, Henry Kissinger set into motion a staged and preferential trading system that would inevitably build the Red Communists into the very model for global dominance. Approving China into the World Trade Organization guaranteed a distorted playing field by favoring PRC and allowing their draconian conditions to engage in business by Oriental Marxists. Empire Building in the Age of Globalization. In the annals of history, it will be noted that it was the United States itself that championed a new economic structure which ultimately undermined its own position in the world. How did this happen? As Western capitalism globalized, China became the factory of the world. As a result, money that could have been spent on education, research and development, modern infrastructure and other requisites for out-competing its rivals was in short supply. Unencumbered by a free market orthodoxy, the Chinese opted for the opposite choice. They poured resources into areas pivotal for building a robust and competitive economy. In real terms, this recipe for economic demise was designed by the transnational corporatists. The intentional encouragement and approval of de-industrializing America has been no accident. The systematic dismantling of the merchant economy followed as plant and equipment manufacturing moved offshore in order to build the Chinese coolie export dynasty. This trade and industry structure was planned as a global warfare assault to bankrupt the American economy. The way back to a viable merchantry is to defeat the 21st Century robber barons who are most vulnerable to any significant drop in their exports. China has proven they are threats to any rational receptacle trading partnership. Would it pursue industrial policies aimed precisely at creating advantages for so many designated key sectors of its economy over foreign competitors? Would it limit exports of critical commodities like rare earths essential for electronics and information technology manufacturing to give its own producers a leg up on rivals press non-Chinese companies to move operations to the PRC? Would it subsidize massive overcapacity in goods like steel and aluminum in order to undercut the competition globally? Would it place so many restrictions on foreign providers of farm products along with banking, insurance, telecommunications, Internet-related, audiovisual, express delivery, legal and other services? Would it remain so determined to keep foreign firms in the dark concerning the regulations concerning licensing and operating requirements; product, investment, and business expansion approvals; and business license renewals? And Beijing at least sounds determined to rein in its unregulated shadow banking firmsâ€”particularly important lending culprits that have showered credit on provincial governments anxious to meet politically rewarding growth targets. Much of the rest of the world has also been abused by their same theft methods. Fear that China will strike back ignores the fact that China cannot afford missing out selling to the U. Americans gain the opportunity to defeat this aggressor by becoming independent of Chinese export dependency. The United States can win this trade war, it is time to get serious.

Nevertheless, China's economic and political future is not inevitable, and Joel Kotkin's recent commentary on www.enganchecubano.com (8/25/) is a very useful starting point for tempering overly optimistic predictions of China's ascendance and America's decline. Joel writes.

Authored by John Rubino via DollarCollapse. But that might be premature. And the US now wants to redress what it sees as unfair terms of trade in the most abrupt way possible. This leaves China with huge debts to service and a possibly a declining trade surplus with which to do it. Chinese markets are in trouble once again. Slowing growth and rising trade tensions are pummeling Chinese shares, with the Shanghai Composite entering a bear market Tuesday. To investors with a long memory, this may sound uncomfortably familiar. The last big yuan selloff, beginning in mid, was heralded by a historic stock-market collapse, a rash of corporate bond defaults and Chinese monetary easing. As in , the U. Investors owning Chinese rather than U. China is now gradually easing monetary policy, while the Federal Reserve is tightening. Trade tensions are rising, and China posted its first current-account deficit since in the first quarter. Growth will probably slow further in the second half. Panic or no panic, a weaker Chinese currency in the months ahead still seems likely. And a lot of people seem to expect an explicit devaluation as the dance progresses. From CNBC a few days ago: China has often been accused by the U. They allow it to trade in a band. All those dollars that Chinese companies and local governments have borrowed would a rising dollar become a lot harder to pay off. To sum up, a Chinese devaluation helps with trade but hurts with debt repayment.
