This probing story of archeological discovery begins in a cemetery crammed with skeletons that offer tantalizing clues about a fierce 16th-century battle between warriors of the collapsing Inca Empire and Spanish invaders. Now, the long-accepted account of a swift Spanish conquest of the Incaâ€”achieved with guns, steel, and horsesâ€”is being replaced by a more complete story based on surprising new evidence, including what may be the first gunshot wound in the Americas. On the outskirts of Lima, Peru, bodies emerge from the sand. Their wounds are horrific. This person died a very violent death. These skeletons may revolutionize our understanding of one of the pivotal events of world history, the Spanish conquest of the Inca. For years, we have had to rely on chronicles written by the Spanish conquistadors to understand what happened. Those chronicles tell us how, in 1532, Francisco Pizarro arrived at the frontiers of the Inca Empire with fewer than 200 men. Ever since, historians have puzzled at the events that followed. How could a handful of Spanish adventurers bring the greatest indigenous civilization of South America to its knees? Was it the vast superiority of the Spanish weapons? Was it European diseases to which the Inca had no resistance? Or was it something else? These skeletons may hold the answers. For the first time, science can open a window on the real events of the conquest of Peru. The discoveries are amazing. A story of the conquest never told before, a story of secret alliances and betrayal Koch and by the Howard Hughes Medical Institute, serving society through biomedical research and science education: For 3, years, the mountains and coasts of Peru were home to the most advanced civilizations of South America. The Inca Empire was the last of many to rise and fall in Peru, but it was the greatest. The Inca were the Romans of the New World. Incomparable builders and engineers, they created Machu Picchu, the most sophisticated road system of the Americas, and countless masterpieces of gold. But their real genius was for conquest. In the 15th century, they used it to conquer the entire Andean region. Twenty-first century Lima, today, is a teeming city of 9, For over 20 years, Peruvian archaeologist and National Geographic grantee Guillermo Cock has been working to unravel the mysteries of these Indian gravesites. Nobody knows more about the ancient burials of Lima. At the beginning of March of 2007, the city was going to open a new highway in the area that we suspected that had a cemetery. The site Guillermo was investigating was an apparently unremarkable hillside in a suburb of Lima called Puruchuco. He set to work with his colleague of many years, archaeologist, Elena Goycochea. Very quickly, their test trench yielded results. The result of the test was about 20 graves in a trench that was two-by-eight meters. That finding led us to conclude that that little ravine was, in fact, a cemetery. At first, the Puruchuco graveyard seemed very similar to others Willy and Elena had excavated. Bodies were buried at regular intervals, in a crouched sitting position, facing the rising sun. This is the classic pattern of Inca burials. But before long, strange anomalies began to appear. In the lower layers of the cemetery, everything seemed to be as Willy would expect in a well-organized Inca graveyard, but on top of these was a layer of bodies buried near the surface which was like nothing he or Elena had ever seen. The body is stretched out this way, facing west. Normally, it should be facing that direction, east. The orientation is all wrong, just like the others. The more they uncovered, the more surprises they found. On top of the corpses of the traditional Inca graveyard, bodies had been thrown in chaotically. Instead of the usual careful wrapping of the body with cotton stuffing and woolen fabrics, these had been hastily wrapped in simple cloths called "telas. None were crouched and facing east in the traditional Inca way. They were without the proper offerings. Now the question was why these individuals had been buried in such an unusual way. To someone who knows the Inca world as well as Willy and Elena, this was mystifying. Reverence for the dead was at the core of Inca culture. Properly performed death rituals were crucial to ensuring the rebirth of the dead in the spirit world, hence their burial in a crouched, expectant pose facing the sunrise, symbol of rebirth. Against this backdrop, the treatment of the bodies at Puruchuco was doubly surprising. When Willy and his team unwrapped the loosely covered skeletons, what they found was even more shocking. Almost all bore marks of extreme violence. Skulls had been crushed, and some showed injuries that had never been seen before in an Inca cemetery, in fact, in any Indian cemetery anywhere in Central or South America. One skeleton in particular really caught their attention. They called him "Mochito," the severed one, because of his horrific injuries. The left, middle and ring finger on the left hand had perhaps been cut off or twisted off. All of these injuries, together, lead me to believe that this individual died a very violent death. This is a very exceptional skeleton for a number of reasons. He is very atypical. One of the defects also has a small radiating fracture, hinging fracture that looks like something caught the outer table of this bone. And based on documented cases of other injuries, it seems consistent with metal-edged weaponry, something else, but not something you would see among Inca weapons. Their deadliest weapons of war were stone clubs, spears and slings, the type of weaponry used by Inca warriors had been obsolete in Europe for over 2,000 years. The Inca army would have been totally beyond the comprehension or historical memory of the Spaniards. It was only 40 years since Christopher Columbus had claimed his first discoveries in the New World for Spain. Since then, indigenous populations of the Americas had been overwhelmed by the relentless Spanish expansion. One reason for that was that the Spanish brought with them two things the Indians had never seen before. The Spanish had enormous advantages of mobility. Their horse was perhaps the second largest advantage they had. Their greatest advantage was their possession of steel weapons. If so, they would be the first ever found. The injury to another skull seemed to prove the link to the conquistadors in an even more dramatic way. And it looks like, as the projectile exited the face and exited this area, it came apart and the entire face was fragmented. This could be a momentous discovery. It would be the first documented gunshot wound in the New World. The primitive but deadly 16th-century guns called "arquebuses" were just one of the many terrifying novelties the Spanish brought with them to South America. The Spanish arquebuses of the conquest were no more awkward than European infantry muskets a hundred years later—a bit heavier for their projectile weight—but the Spaniards knew how to use them. They knew how to use them well. The combination of guns, steel weapons and cavalry had a devastating effect on native armies. The Inca had no defense against any of them. The European response to a cavalry charge had been learned over centuries of exposure to mounted combat. Over the short term, the Inca had no response whatsoever to cavalry. And there was yet another deadly cargo brought by the Spanish, which would eventually decimate the Inca population, disease. But no one is sure exactly when the first epidemics arrived. If the suspected gunshot wound is real, it would be unprecedented. So Melissa needs proof. She hopes that x-rays might reveal traces of metal around the edges of the wound. It looks like no. The negative result is a blow. To Melissa and Willy, the wound clearly suggests a gunshot. Perhaps the metal traces left by the musket ball were too miniscule for the x-rays to detect. So Willy decides on a bold course of action. It is 4,000 miles away at the University of New Haven in Connecticut. With cutting edge forensic techniques, if anyplace can get some results from the skeletons of Puruchuco, it is here. Top forensic scientists Al Harper and Tim Palmbach have examined hundreds of gunshot wounds, a lot fresher than the one in Peru. Before long, Al and Tim are in Lima. The lure of examining what may be the first gunshot wound in the Americas is irresistible. Work on this astonishing collection of mummies and skeletons has been temporarily abandoned as Mochito and his band take center stage. Al and Tim immediately focus on what Melissa thought might be the gunshot wound.
