Your Touchstone Energy Cooperative. Touchstone Energy Cooperatives are dedicated to service according to four core values - integrity, accountability, innovation and commitment to community.

Concern for Community Facilities Chugach uses various generation resources to ensure reliable, affordable power. At the end of December , Chugach had The unit ratings shown are taken at 30 degrees Fahrenheit. In , 86 percent of the kilowatt-hours Chugach sold came from natural gas units, 11 percent from hydroelectric resources and 3 percent from wind. Among other things, the rapid growth in population strained utility services and the city declined to extend electric service beyond the city limits. In , a group of residents in areas outside the formal city boundaries met to discuss forming an electric cooperative. Chugach was incorporated in Alaska on March 1, , with funding under the Rural Electrification Act of , as amended. In Chugach refinanced and paid off its federal debt, leaving the REA program. Today, Chugach remains a cooperative and ranks among the largest of the nearly electric cooperatives nationwide. The population was estimated at less than 20, by the Interior Department. Life was much different in Anchorage a half century ago. In fact, as early as - as the territory boomed during World War II - electricity became a critical commodity in Anchorage, and was soon in short supply. The existing hydroelectric plants at Eklutna, as well as supplemental diesel generators, were soon taxed far beyond their capacity. The hulk was beached at the mouth of Ship Creek, and the boilers and generating equipment were used to deliver much-needed power. Unfortunately, the cost was nearly one cent per kilowatt-hour more than the city collected in revenue. It was that resolute spirit and strong vision that brought people together in August of to form a cooperative to bring power to their homes and businesses. That meeting became a promise for the power Anchorage desperately needed to grow and flourish. And then, on November 11, as the darkness of winter loomed over the city, Chugach turned on the lights in nine homes in Rogers Park. Anchorage International Airport was nearing completion. A paved road between Anchorage and the Matanuska Valley was planned. A road to link the Kenai Peninsula and Anchorage was commenced. Bold Energy, New Horizons In just four short years, Chugach went from nine member customers to more than 5, From makeshift, unreliable sources of electrical supply in to the modern 9, kilowatt Knik Arm power plant in , Chugach energized south central Alaska with power to spare. In the years leading up to statehood in , Chugach delivered the energy for growth, forging new partnerships and expanding generation and distribution capabilities. Chugach begins selling power to the Matanuska Electric Association to meet growing demand for electricity in the Mat-Su Valley. Chugach opens new offices at 8th and Gambell in Anchorage. Chugach continues to extend power lines to connect new customers throughout the Anchorage Bowl, from Mountain View to the Turnagain area. Chugach spearheads an initiative by the Central Alaska Power Association to build a hydroelectric power plant at Cooper Lake. Chugach purchases Inlet Power and Light Company, adding 1, customers to its 7, strong membership. The Eklutna power plant comes on-line with two megawatt generators to serve Anchorage and the Mat-Su Valley. Chugach begins planning for a mile service line to extend service to the Portage area. Chugach energizes the first section of the new Portage power line. Meanwhile, expansion of the steam capacity at the Knik Arm power plant increases output from 9. Negotiations are finalized with the railroad; Chugach assumes management and operation of the Knik Arm plant. Chugach assumes management of the Cooper Lake power plant. In just 12 short years, Chugach member ranks had swelled from the original nine households to more than 12, homes and businesses, and the days of uncertain electrical power were all but forgotten. The Cooper Lake power plant came on-line, and Chugach began to look at gas-fired power generation when oil and gas is discovered off the Kenai Peninsula. Chugach begins construction of a mile distribution line to provide power to consumers in Moose Pass, Cooper Landing and the surrounding Kenai Lake area. With the completion of the transmission line between the Kenai Peninsula and Anchorage, power flows from Cooper Lake to Anchorage for the first time. Standard of California discovers the Beluga River gas field. Chugach dedicates the 7. A contract is signed to furnish power to Homer Electric. Rock and Roll Comes to Alaska At 5: Chugach generation and distribution facilities were hit hard. As ground levels heaved and shifted dramatically, the entire Anchorage area lost power. Generators were knocked offline, and transmission lines snapped in the wake of the quake. Emergency crews scrambled to assess damage, make repairs and restore power as quickly as possible. Within 24 hours Chugach restored operation of a single generator at the Knik Arm plant, and with the help of the military and the city, power is restored to much of the city. It took weeks of round-the-clock effort to repair much of the damage. But just a few short months following the quake, Chugach was once again looking ahead and charting new directions for growth and expansion. Clean-burning, economical and efficient, natural gas was fast becoming the fuel of choice at Chugach. Meanwhile, Chugach completed the first unit at its International Airport Road power plant, a megawatt unit that could run off natural gas or oil. That same year, Chugach was chosen to supply electricity to Whittier, a town particularly hardhit during the earthquake. The population of Anchorage tops , Chugach adds a second megawatt unit at the International plant, and begins construction of the Beluga plant along with transmission lines to Anchorage. Underwater cables were laid in Cook Inlet to carry power between Pt. Hope in more ways than one was added to the Chugach system in November of Chugach ushers in a new era of electrical power for Anchorage and many customers throughout the Railbelt area. In March of , the first power from two More Bang for the Boom Generation, transmission and distribution systems were expanded and upgraded to keep pace with the rising population. A second megawatt gas-fired turbine was added at Bernice Lake in , and a second set of underwater cables added between Pt. In , the largest turbine at the time, a megawatt gas-fired unit was installed at Beluga. With the discovery of oil on the North Slope, Southcentral Alaska boomed as never before. Chugach added four new underwater cables between Pt. Chugach added two more gas turbines to its system: And then, fueled in part by a drop in worldwide oil prices, the latter half of the decade plunged Southcentral Alaska into a deep recession. With thoughtful belt-tightening and aggressive management, Chugach weathered the recession and continued to expand and upgrade capacity and service. Chugach installed its eighth and final unit at Beluga, a megawatt unit that created "free" electricity by running on steam generated by two other units. Chugach installed a fourth unit at Bernice Lake, a Following several years of serious revenue deficits, Chugach rebounded owing in part to a long overdue rate increase instituted the previous year. Chugach moves its headquarters to its present location, a new building beside the International power plant. Chugach power dispatchers can now monitor and troubleshoot generation, transmission and distribution problems from Chugach headquarters. Also in , power began flowing from Anchorage over the new intertie completed by the Alaska Power Authority linking Anchorage and Fairbanks. Chugach began intensive systemwide maintenance of turbines and generators, including the overhaul of units at Bernice Lake, Cooper Lake and Beluga.
