Dry skin in older adults can be simply a sign of age-related skin changes or signify underlying medical problems. Other factors such as the environment, genetics, and ethnicity are also contributing factors. Skin loses its elasticity as the production of collagen and elastin decreases. Because of these changes, skin becomes progressively thinner, more fragile, less elastic, and drier. Even the natural oil-producing sebaceous glands gradually lose their ability to moisturize the skin. All of these physiologic changes contribute to the development of drier skin as people age, says Charles E. Even as early as the age of 40, the skin becomes more susceptible to drying. Lipids primarily act by preventing evaporation of the natural moisture in the skin, providing a barrier to water loss. Without adequate lipids, people simply lose too much water from the skin and it dries out, according to Jamie B. Underlying Causes In addition, older adults often have comorbidities for which they take many medications. Multiple conditions and numerous medications can contribute to dry skin in older adults, MacKelfresh says. Diuretics as well as renal, cardiovascular, and thyroid problems can contribute to xerosis, she says. These products remove more of the essential skin oils necessary to help keep the skin moist and retain water. Even over-the-counter antiaging creams can be quite drying and actually harsh on the skin. Find out how long a patient has been experiencing problems with dry skin, determine whether the dry skin is widespread or concentrated, and ask whether a patient uses moisturizing lotions or creams and if so, whether they help or worsen the dry skin. Crutchfield stresses the importance of asking patients how long they have been dealing with dry skin. Assessing the duration of the skin dryness is important because it may be a condition called ichthyosis, which is a congenital defect that can develop with time and aging. If the dry skin appears to be severe or has occurred suddenly, it would require further investigation, he says. MacKelfresh agrees on the importance of identifying the time of onset. For instance, heat stroke could be an underlying disease that is causing dry skin. Also, fungal infections of the skin can be a common cause, particularly in nursing homes and other care settings. Many older adults may not be bothered by their dry skin. While performing a general exam, physicians will likely see dry skin on the legs. Ask whether he or she is experiencing flaking, itchy, irritated, or even sore skin, MacKelfresh says. Crutchfield notes that while assessing dry skin is fairly easy, there are some rare issues physicians need to be aware of, especially in patients of color. On the lower leg, a condition called ichthyosiform sarcoidosis can occur, also with generalized exfoliating dermatitis, which can be confused with dry skin. While studies addressing the differences in ethnic skin are limited, one study has reported greater transepidermal water loss and desquamation in African American skin. Suggest that patients keep a moisturizer in the bathroom and apply a thick moisturizer within three minutes of taking a bath or shower and apply it more than once per day, she says. And you can find some of those over the counter. Crutchfield recommends that his patients gently pat dry their skin with a cotton towel after a bath or shower, then apply a liberal amount of emollient moisturizing lotion. A lactic acid lotion will improve the skin condition. In some cases a topical steroid cream needs to be used. Using strong corticosteroid creams such as clobetasol for a long period of time may lead to skin problems such as thinning, stretch marks, and skin breakdown. Special Cases MacKelfresh recalls the case of an year-old woman who was wheelchair bound. The skin also displayed evidence of scratching in those areas. She prescribed a topical steroid cream and provided the patient with careful instructions to use only gentle soap, take short warm never hot baths or showers, and apply a thick moisturizer within three minutes of bathing. For those patients, be sure to do a thorough exam by looking for dry skin areas before they become problematic. So utilizing multiple members of the team is going to be key in those scenarios as well. As the number of baby boomers in the United States grows, it is becoming increasingly important for clinicians to recognize and treat elder patients for skin problems. While prevention is key, treating dry skin is fairly easy and affordable. Advice for Patients Rita Pichardo-Geisinger, MD, an assistant professor of dermatology at Wake Forest University, offers some practical advice to help patients and their caregivers prevent and reduce the risk of developing dry skin: Avoid hot baths, frequent showering or bathing, and excessive skin scrubbing. Keep the water warm because hot water tends to strip away the natural oils produced by the skin. Avoid overwashing with harsh soaps and overusing alcohol-based products such as sanitizers and cleansing agents that are drying to the skin. Keeping dry skin hydrated is the best way to avoid potential problems such as itchiness and cracking. The best recommendation is to use a fragrance-free moisturizer. Elderly skin care is all about preventing dry skin. Moisturizing the skin will keep it hydrated and help to prevent the itch-scratch-rash-itch cycle. Examining elderly patients should always include evaluating their skin for signs of cancer or other conditions. Be sure to look for new growths or moles that appear to be changing. Identify skin changes such as peeling, chapped, red, or pruritic skin. In older individuals the skin of the feet often gets dry and becomes susceptible to corns, calluses, warts, and fungal infections. It is important to check the feet regularly, especially in patients with diabetes. Dry skin in dermatology: J Eur Acad Dermatol Venereol.
