Date[edit] Northward Ho could not have been staged prior to Eastward Ho, which was in existence by September This suggests that the last of them, Northward Ho, must have been performed during the last half of In consequence, they have decided to play a malicious prank on her husband. They encounter Mayberry and his friend Bellamont, seemingly by chance, and tell the two men a story of how they Featherstone and Greenshield have both seduced the wife of a London tradesman; they keep her name secret at first, but then let it slip as if by accident. The two pairs part; Mayberry is deeply distressed at the idea that his wife has been unfaithful to him. His older and wiser friend Bellamont protests, and points out the obvious unlikelihood of the encounter: Bellamont has a son named Philip who, like many young men, enjoys the pursuit of drink, women, and gambling. His friends Liverpool and Chartley and the prostitute Doll witness the arrest and are tempted to intervene, but Philip stops them; he sends a tavern servant to his father for bail. Doll and company decide to set up a confidence game, what was then called "coney-catching. Liverpool and Chartley masquerade as her servants. She is courted by, and exploits, various potential suitors, including a Dutch visitor named Hans van Belch, a local grocer called Allum , and a Welsh soldier, Captain Jenkins. Northward Ho, in contrast, employs blatant stereotypical ethnic and dialect humor. In pursuit of his revenge, Mayberry maintains a friendly relationship with Featherstone and Greenshield. Philip, playing a joke on his father, has Doll summon Bellamont for a potential commission. Bellamont is a poet, and provides verses for fees. When Doll asks Bellamont what he thinks of her, he calls her "a most admirable, brave, beautiful whore. Captain Jenkins comes to Bellamont to commission a madrigal for Doll. Jenkins exposes her to her other "gulls," and Doll and company find it expedient to leave the city; they flee northwards. Featherstone, in pursuing his own sexual and financial goals, has set himself and the Greenshields on a trip to Ware; Bellamont and the Mayberrys travel along as part of their revenge plan. Along the way, the group stops at Bethlem Royal Hospital , or "Bedlam," to view the madmen; the others play a joke on Bellamont, and make the keeper think that the poet is a lunatic who has been fooled into coming to the hospital. Bellamont has a fit of temper and hits the keeper before the others come to his rescue. The three female characters in the sequel are far more distinct, extending along the full range of morality: Mayberry being the chaste and virtuous wife, Kate Greenshield the "bad" adulterous wife, and Doll the professional prostitute.
