A Key to Modern British Poetry Bitter Lemons The Alexandria Quartet Overview Lawrence Durrell is known primarily as the author of The Alexandria Quartet , a set of four novels widely considered to be among the finest achievements in twentieth-century fiction. Continuing in the tradition of James Joyce and D. Lawrence, Durrell experiments with the structure of the novel while also probing the human psyche. His work is infused with observations on the nature of reality and sexuality, based in part on the theories of Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud. England had officially made India a part of the British Empire in 1858, after many Indians had attempted to drive out the British East India Company , which had effectively ruled much of India for a century. Among the many industries that flourished in India were primarily for trade and shipment back to England were cotton and silk production. Despite his family history, Durrell considered himself an Irishman. His father was an engineer who worked on the construction of the Darjeeling railroad line which skirts the Himalayas. Durrell attended the College of St. Joseph in Darjeeling, and at the age of eleven, he was sent to England to continue his education at St. He became a jazz pianist at a London nightclub called The Blue Peter while aspiring to be a writer. After marrying artist Nancy Myers, Durrell completely devoted his energies to becoming a novelist. Oppressed by the hardship of life in a grimy quarter of London, Durrell was also stung by the stifling pressure of British society on his artistic ambitions. He wanted to live the life of an expatriate writer and to recreate the life of London in his novels, much as the expatriate James Joyce had done for Dublin. It was in Corfu that Durrell began reading the work of Henry Miller , whose work would have a major influence on the artist. Your commercial career is finished. The Alexandria Quartet After a nineteen-year break in his novel-writing career, Durrell produced what would become the centerpiece of his career as a novelist: In this ambitious and intricate series of novels, Durrell attempted to create a fictional parallel of twentieth-century physics, based on the theories he had developed in his one book of literary criticism, A Key to Modern British Poetry. There is, in a sense, no objective truth to be discovered. The fourth novel, Clea, is a more traditional chronological narrative which takes the characters through the war years. Durrell died of emphysema at his home in the village of Sommieres on November 7, 1968. Sensing the limitations of conventional novels and poetry, authors were trying to figure out how the human experience could be fully expressed in literature. Durrell primarily subscribed to these kinds of experimentation, though he also delved into some narrative design experimentation in his acclaimed The Alexandria Quartet. This American novelist often experimented not only with the limitations of the novel form but also with the use of dialect. In The Black Book, Durrell deliberately tried to create a plot that would move in memory but remain static in linear time, radiating instead out into space. The outer plot, a story of love, mystery, and spies, is narrated by a young writer who takes an archetypal journey to find love, self-knowledge, and his artistic voice. He writes a first novel Justine about a love affair in Alexandria, and then follows with Balthazar, which contradicts the first by quoting other people. In this novel, the plot is developed in backward chronological order and is completely immersed in the dialect of the Deep South, thereby requiring readers to discover a new way to think in order to follow the details of the novel. Successful experimentation with memory and its effect on novel chronology does not merely describe this sensation; the reader actually has a sense of what it feels like to be living within two realities. Much like the travel literature of Norman Douglas and D. Lawrence, they recreate the ambience of places loved, the characters of people known, and the history and mythology of each unique island world. The idea here seems to be that, so long as stories are told by human beings, they are defined by their subjectivity; therefore, the stories will not be reliable sources of truth. Here are some other examples of artistic works that wrestle with the idea of subjectivity as it relates to truth: A tragic encounter between a bandit and a samurai and his wife is recounted several different ways by the participants and witnesses including the dead samurai, who offers his testimony through a medium. The Indian Killer , by Sherman Alexie. In a traditional murder mystery novel form, Alexie introduces a new twist: Because the serial killer in this novel is never discovered, murder and fear continue to reign at the end of the novel, and the truth is never found. In comparison, Reflections on a Marine Venus is a harsher, less romantic look at the life of the people of Rhodes immediately after the war. It seems unlikely in a way, but nevertheless the two main architects of this breakthrough have been Einstein and Freud. Well, this novel is a four-dimensional dance, a relativity poem. Consider specifically the use of repeated stories from different viewpoints. In these novels, Durrell attempts to bring to life the myths, the geography, and the people of the islands he describes. British Travel Writing in the Twentieth Century.
