4. The text is based on real events and information. 5. Use the text features such as charts, graphs, lists, and diagrams. This may seem like the definition of nonfiction, but it is always important to directly instruct our students on what it is they are doing with the text in front of them.

One of the major shifts called for in the CCLS is an emphasis on developing the skills required for comprehending and analyzing informational text. The ultimate goal of this shift is that by increasing the exposure to informational text, students will be better prepared for college and careers. So many times the terms nonfiction and informational text are used interchangeably. Are they one in the same? My research, and that which is included in the test guides administered by NYS, see informational text as much more than just nonfiction text. There are different types of informational text. The format of the text can affect that text, how it is written and how the it is to be read. A notion worth considering is that not all non-fiction text is informational text. Informational text is text that contains ideas, facts, and principles related to the physical, biological, or social world rather than an individual instance. In many situations, people are counting all their non-fiction and claiming it as informational. Much of the curriculum in the past was focused around a textbook. Textbooks are not of themselves literature, but are a specific type of literature of which to study. High-quality informational texts are crucial to the development of the concept called content literacy. Content literacy is the use of strategies which are required to read, comprehend, analyze, and write in a variety of subjects. Each subject has its own style and way of organizing information in text. Learning how to read informational text requires higher level strategies of gathering information, summarizing, synthesizing, and connecting information to prior knowledge. The readers of informational text must also analyze the information with an overall organizational structure and ask critical questions of how the information is being documented and fits together. According to Fountas and Pinnell in Guiding Readers and Writers, the feature and patterns of text structures in informational text help the reader locate the information. So, is there a difference between non-fiction and informational text? Nonfiction text is just one type of informational text. The strategies needed for students to be better prepared for college and career, as called for in the CCLS, far exceeds those called for in reading and writing just non-fiction text. Informational text spans the subject areas, builds connections between subjects, strengthens vocabulary, and provides opportunities to deepen our knowledge base and our literacy curriculum.
