What is Self esteem exactly? Simply speaking, self esteem is the sum total of all the beliefs you hold about yourself; the good, the bad and the ugly. It is all about how you feel about yourself. Those beliefs and how you perceive yourself, either negatively or positively, create the difference between a low and high self esteem. If you suffer with a low self esteem however, you may tend to find it hard to let go and move on. Without help, you may even take away more negative beliefs about your life and yourself, to a point where it feels like you are carrying the weight of the world on your shoulders. Low self esteem tends to be a vicious circle that can in turn also leave you vulnerable to abuse from many quarters. Signs of low self esteem Feel like a failure? Find it hard to say no? Hate the way you look? Dislike the person you are? Find you apologise even when something is not your fault? Worry about what others think of you? If you answer "yes" to some or all of the above statements, it is likely you are suffering from low self esteem. Our confidence and self esteem is often rooted in our subconscious mind. Psychotherapy is an incredibly effective tool for clients suffering with low self esteem as it works by getting to the root cause of the problem. In addition hypnotherapy works by making changes on the subconscious level; reprogramming negative beliefs for positive thought patterns. You can expect to feel more confident and self assured, which in turn will allow you to become the confident person you really want and deserve to be. Help for self esteem Of course confidence building can be used for more than just self esteem problems. Whether you are worried about speaking in public, going for that job interview you have been dreading or taking your driving test, hypnotherapy can help you to achieve your full potential. 2: Building confidence in the South China Sea

Confidence building from the sea by Vijay Sakhuja, , Knowledge World edition, in English.

Diplomatic and Security Dialogue, the reaching of a series of consensus on conflict prevention and dispute management measures, and the establishment of a bilateral intergovernmental consultation mechanism for the settlement of the South China Sea dispute between China and the Philippines. There are also factors that could disrupt the fragile stability that has been established in the South China Sea: Regional countries should endeavor to jointly to maintain the positive trend in the South China Sea, while non-regional powers should avoid pursuing actions that could disrupt the cooperation and progress that has been achieved between the littoral countries of the South China Sea. To this end, this analysis proposes maritime confidence building measures MCBM from four different perspectives, political, legal, security, and regional cooperation. Political China and the United States should establish an effective and integrated mechanism to manage potential crisis in the South China sea. China and disputant countries should exercise self-restraint, and avoid unilateral exploration and exploitation of natural resources in disputed areas. Effective maritime regimes require adherence to the legal principles of UNCLOS, as well as to other relevant international maritime treaties. This is particularly the case with provisions relating to the exclusive economic zone EEZ regime. The EEZ regime reflects a careful balance between the rights and obligations of coastal states and those of user states. Clarifying EEZ ambiguities and establishing a common understanding of aspects of the law of the sea where uncertainty exists would be a significant MCBM. For example, the innocent passage regime in Section 3 of the convention places specific restrictions on warships exercising the right of innocent passage, including a requirement that submarines navigate territorial seas while surfaced and display their flag. By clarifying the principles for delimiting maritime boundaries between adjacent states and establishing the EEZ regime UNCLOS reduces the risk of a conflict arising from disputes over claims to offshore areas. However, despite the value ascribed to the compulsory dispute settlement under UNCLOS, this case does not make a positive contribution to resolving the real dispute between the two parties. Navigation This analysis considers the development and efficacy of maritime confidence-building measures CBMs to ensure safe and secure navigation in the region, and to reduce tension and prevent conflict. Though many problems and unsolved issues persist, the MOU contributes much to the confidence building between the two navies. In the China-U. China and the United States should seek to preserve good faith and a positive spirit in their military relations, despite the divergence in their legal views on maritime issues. As far as the South China Sea dispute is concerned, they should maintain interactive military relations in order to guard against misjudgment, reduce confrontation, and manage and control crises. Both countries should endeavor to avoid escalation stemming from confrontations or tensions triggered by frequent U. China and the United States have a common interest in maintaining the peace and stability in this region, and in further enhancing maritime cooperation on non-traditional security. The benefits of such efforts should not be underestimated and call for both countries to remain calm, guard against misinterpretation, and expand channels for military exchange and communication. Both countries should also advance existing crisis-management mechanisms based on the principles of the U. Regional cooperation The South China Sea disputes consist of a mix of territorial competition and pending maritime delimitation. A peaceful resolution to them is in the common interest of all disputant parties and other stakeholders. However, what is the most practical approach that fits well in the reality of the nature of the South China Sea dispute remains a question for debate. As analyzed from the implication of the South China Sea arbitration case, compulsory dispute settlement mechanisms may not be the best option to address the disputes in the South China Sea. The state practice of maritime dispute management in this region suggests that there is not a unique or single answer as to which model is the best. Instead, a four tiered model of maritime dispute management is needed, namely, environmental security as a driving force of cooperation in the South China Sea, fisheries cooperation as a start of the South China Sea disputes resolution, UNCLOS as a framework for ocean governance in the South China Sea, and lastly, transformation of ways of thinking as a foundation to lead policy and research direction.
