Most of these children and young adults are still attending school, making them a focal point for companies that are seeing talent shortages for certain jobs. Members of Gen Z are still young enough for teachers to shape their educational experience and, hopefully, better prepare them for those open positions. Nonprofits and foundations are also keeping an eye on Gen Z to influence the causes that matter to them. As organizations have begun focusing on members of this young generation, a few things have become clear: That is precisely why marketers should engage with teachers to reach this young audience. Educators spend six or more hours a day with young people, they write the curriculum, and they steer conversations in the classroom. In fact, in a recent Gen Z market poll, students told MDR that teachers are more influential than anyone else – even parents – when it comes to making decisions about what classes to take, what subject they should major in, and what professions they should consider. Lower-income students are even more likely to say that teachers are their most important influence when it comes to shaping their career interests and their class selections. If organizations want to reach members of this young audience, shape their career paths, and spark their interest in nonprofit causes, they have to engage with teachers as well. Here are three ways you can do that: Offer engaging educational materials that teachers can use in class. Hand2mind, a company that sells math products, understands this. The company recently held a Facebook Live event on the WeAreTeachers Facebook page to offer tips and tricks teachers can use to make math more fun and engaging for younger students. Provide opportunities for students to volunteer. Gen Z is hungry for opportunities to do good, and corporations and nonprofits are providing avenues for young people to do that. In alone, nearly 2 million young people participated in the program. By teaming up with partners like MDR and WeAreTeachers, Allstate is reaching teacher influencers so it can be more effective in empowering youth to make a real difference. Encourage physical fitness and overall well-being. Teachers want their students to be physically fit, eat healthily, manage stress in constructive ways, and steer clear of drugs and alcohol, and they tend to favor companies and organizations that share these values. By targeting teachers, you not only provide great educational opportunities for use in the classroom, but you also influence Gen Z. This study will let you in on how and why young people get their influence.
