Indenture forms part of the long history of unfree labor that began with seventeenth-century debt peonage from Europe and re-emerged in a new form after abolition when hundreds of thousands of Asians, from British India and China, were imported to perform agricultural labor across the hemisphere. An experience colored by abuse, fugitivity, and suicide, the entanglement of debt, race and labor, also includes smaller waves of indentured African and Javanese migrants who were conscripted into unfree plantation economies after emancipation. Key Questions How do the descendants of indenture mourn and mediate the lived experience of the institution and represent its afterlife? In the mosaic of unfree labors that shaped the hemisphere, how do race and language play a role in approaches to analyzing indenture in relation to enslavement and blackbirding? In what present forms does debt bondage continue in the Caribbean? The Odyssey of Indenture. Hoover Institution Press, Kevin Yelvington, Producing power: Ethnicity, gender, and class in a Caribbean workplace Temple University Press, Nation-building, sovereignty and inequality Beginning in the late eighteenth century, new political actors across the Caribbean emerged to contest European colonial rule. From the the Haitian Revolution and the founding of the Republic of Haiti to the Cuban wars of independence culminating in the Spanish-Cuban-American War , new and old colonial powers deployed debt as a form of power to limit Caribbean sovereignty and access to resources. What role did debt play in the struggles for independence and Caribbean nation-building processes? How did economic inequality affect the economic and political development of Caribbean nations? What was the impact of colonial institutions in the state building process and how did these help or hinder these processes?
