Click to Tweet Design There are several types of fly fishing reel design available in the market. We will discuss the three main designs of fly fishing reels. Large arbors are the most modern fly reel design in the market. These arbors are physically larger than other two designs for the same line rating. With the bigger diameter and wider construction, the larger arbor fly reels will provide a good backing capacity and a fast retrieval rate. These are traditional fly reel design which is still loved by a lot of fly angler for using in smaller fishing rods and traditional cane fly rods. These fly reels provide might not provide the best line storage and may even drop the effectiveness of your line. However, if you are fly fishing in saltwater, you need a fly reel which is saltwater friendly. You need a corrosion resistance fly reel to face the harsh saltwater condition. Otherwise, your freshwater fly reel will get damaged very soon. Weight Handling A fly reel which can handle adequate fly line is not the best reel for fly fishing. You need to pick a fly reel which allows you to hold enough amount of backing and fly line for the weight of the fly fishing rod you are using. Otherwise, it will be a very bad experience and you may not even fish properly. Assume you are using a weight 6 fly rod, you need a fly reel which can accommodate the fly line weights from This is where the size of the reel matters. Drag System Another important thing is to check the drag system of a fly reel. While an expensive fly reel will provide excellent drag system, a cheap fly reel might not. If you are buying a cheap fly reel, you need to check whether the drag system is good or not. A good drag system will help you hold up big fishes. On the other hand, a cheap drag system will make it tough to battle active fishes. However, if you are fishing trout, then an inexpensive drag system will do the job. A fly reel made of high-quality raw materials will ensure high durability, performance and lifetime. Usually, most fly reels with cheap price may come with fragile body, but the reels mentioned above are bound to last for a long time. I have mentioned some best of the best fly reels with premium quality raw materials, and besides providing high performance, they are able to withstand harsh marine environments. Though most top notch fly fishing reels are expensive, I have had the time to find some best cheap fly fishing reels for you. Most expensive fly reels are made of high-quality raw materials and offers improved performance than the cheap fly reels. If you are not ready to break the bank, there are still some excellent cheap fly reels from different manufacturer like Piscifun and MaxCatch. I hope this fly fishing reels review will help you to choose the best reel for fly fishing.
