In , with a population of more than souls, Ingersoll was incorporated as a Village. One of the foremost duties of the Council was to see that a municipal building was erected as soon as possible. Land was acquired and the building was completed in Consisting of a hall, dog pound, jail and municipal office, the structure was known locally as the market building. One of the many disastrous fires to strike Ingersoll began early in the hours of February 1, and the village hall, its new bell, and all the municipal records for Ingersoll and West Oxford were totally destroyed. Council was forced to meet in a room in the Daly House, later known as the Ingersoll Inn. The advent of the Great Western Railway through Ingersoll also heightened the popularity of the Daly House and other hotels in town, which in turn resulted in the need for a sizeable lockup! Pomroy of London and work began on the new village hall in The first designs for the building drawn up by the contractor, W. Yielding to public deliberations, the plans were modified by a young local architect, John MacNiven and the new village hall followed the Italianate style of architecture popular at the time. Built from yellow brick, the hall became the centre of public life in Ingersoll. Many prominent and outstanding, and occasionally outspoken, individuals graced its stage. Prime Ministers John A. Macdonald, Alexander Mackenzie and Wilfrid Laurier gave speeches here; travelling thespians performed here, while in even the notorious American abolitionist John Brown held a public meeting here about the evils of slavery. Over the years there were subsequent fires in town, two of which actually took place at the town hall. One, in was said to have been set by a prisoner held in the basement jail; he died in his own blaze. Council then decided that the town needed better fire protection and a Over the years, the town hall became less important in the lives of its citizens especially after the town offices and police station were located to the former Market Building constructed to the north of the old structure. The Ingersoll Creative Arts Centre was located on the main floor until it was decided to tear down the old building. The Ingersoll Inn, which had been directly connected to many of the events and activities held in the town hall throughout the years also succumbed to the wreckers ball to make way for the new Town of Ingersoll Municipal Offices and public library.
