This week has a big place in Russian history Moscow, specifically: February 5, marked the opening of Eliseevsky grocery store in Moscow. The creation of renowned merchant Grigory Eliseev, it opened on Tverskaya Street in the historic former Volkonsky family mansion. It initially hosted five departments: Furthermore, the store also hosted wine cellars and production departments, such as a bakery. The Eliseevsky soon became famous throughout the whole country for its luxurious interiors and top-notch service. Nowadays the refurbished store Eliseevsky is still located at Tverskaya Street 14 and is open to the public. Can you always make do without a map while looking for the next whiskey bar in an unfamiliar city? My interest in maps and alcohol led me to this project. The map is available for purchase in different forms including printed on a raincoat. The location sets the scene with both the interior and the menu inspired by Soviet history. The founders of Moskovskoye Nebo promise to open two more restaurants of Russian historical cuisine: Easy come, easy go It was weak, limp somehow. It carried neither a request nor a summons from unearthly powers. However, Danilov grew agitated. He looked down and determined that the signal was coming from a thirty-six-year-old man in a nutria hat. He was standing at the entrance to Ostankino Park near the doughnut stand. Some officials claim that the land lease contract has expired while others state that the land belongs to a protected zone and the stand should be replaced with a new one according to Moscow law. However, Muscovites intend to defend their favorite street food spot by signing a petition. The sticky and healthy produce of beekeepers from various regions of Russia will be on display. You can taste and buy all kinds of traditional and exotic honey including rapeseed, sainfoin and sweet clover honey, as well as propolis, royal jelly, beeswax and information on medicine and beekeeping.
