Daughters of Destiny, a four-part documentary on Netflix, chronicles the lives of five girls over a seven-year period as they navigate two very different worlds – that of the poverty and prejudice into which they were born, and the other of opportunity through Shanti Bhavan. Shanti Bhavan is a

She has been married for over twenty years and her husband now plans to get remarried. He, now, desperately wants a son and believes, and his parents believe too, that a second wife will most certainly produce one for him. A relationship of twenty years with all the emotional investment that Rehmat Bibi has made in it over the years is soon going to end. Her daughters, who are now grown up, can sense the tension at home. When they see their mother crying they hold themselves responsible for her misery. Is it a crime to be a daughter? Fazilat is another lady showing symptoms of anxiety. She was married at the age of twelve to a man no less than forty years her senior in age. This was because her father died when she was still a child and the mother faced with the burden of other children could not afford her upbringing. She ultimately found a solution by marrying her daughter to a man old enough to be her grandfather. The above are true case stories. Only the names have been changed. There are numerous other tragic experiences that scream of the misery that women suffer in our society. Most suffer silently accepting it as a part of their destiny, others unable to cope, break down after a period resulting in physical and psychiatric symptoms which are too frequently misinterpreted by the family as being the result of possession by the evil spirits. They are then taken to various quacks and faith healers who further confirm this belief. We all rejoice at the birth of a son whereas the birth of a daughter, especially the second one and almost always the third one, is considered an unbearable tragedy. The family mourns the loss of the expected son that did not arrive and if that was not sad enough they also mourn the arrival of an unwanted daughter who places heavy burdens on them. We must admit that we parents are basically very insecure and selfish. We welcome the birth of a son because in our later years we can make use of him as a crutch to provide us support and security. We happily invest in his education and upbringing because we can count on him to provide for us in our old age and look after us when we are sick. This, of course, does not apply to a daughter in our culture. She is sooner or later, going to be married leaving her parents to become part of another family. On the day of marriage, she is repeatedly reminded and warned in different ways that under all circumstances she has to put up with her in-laws and that it is only her dead body that should ever leave their house for good. In this manner, the honor of the family is considered upheld. The rules whereby marriages are arranged and conducted in our society are, to say the least, preposterous. We witness these everyday, and have done so for decades, but somehow seem little perturbed by them. For many daughters, moving in to live with their in-laws is the start of a never-ending nightmare. The issue is not who is more at fault, the girl or the in-laws. The problem lies with the setup. The newly wed girl, who till recently, was doted on by her parents, is suddenly, overnight, thrown at the deep end. She is now instantaneously expected to assume roles and responsibilities, which she has never experienced before. Not only that she is also expected to perform impeccably with no room to make mistakes. She is under a constant psychological surveillance by the in laws who would leave no stone unturned to detect even the slightest fault and make a mount Everest of it. Jealousy, unrealistic expectations, intolerance, rigidity, and many other factors ultimately lead to a constant power struggle. In most cases, the girl realizing that she has little choice is forced to give in. The choice is not hard to make. She then pins all her hopes on her children, particularly the sons. Advertisement Can this pathetic system change? I believe it can, but not by any act of parliament. We have enough of these already but with little results. The first step and I feel the most important one is to bring about a change in the way we think and believe. To give one example, let us try to look for security in other support systems apart from desperately searching for it in the birth of a son. Everywhere we hear so much talk about faith, and trust in God but deep down, especially when getting in touch with our real selves, we discover that we have more faith in our male offspring than God Almighty. In other words, we need to confront our own internal insecurities. Once we succeed in changing our collective thinking, the social system we live in will slowly start changing as well. It is a product of our faulty attitudes and patterns of distorted thinking. The tragedy is that we have allowed ourselves to become psychological slaves to something that we have created ourselves. Another thing that requires urgent attention involves laws relating to women. A lot has been said and written about this. I sometimes wonder if the resistance to change may be attributed to the fact that the majority of our representatives dealing with the process are males. When it comes to laws involving the rights of women they do so with the image of a wife in their minds and therefore have a strong tendency towards not being too generous in granting them much liberty and freedom. If men when dealing with laws pertaining to women could visualize their own daughters, sisters and mothers being affected by it, I am sure the outcome would be very different, particularly in the area of marriage and divorce. We also need to review the traditional interpretation of our religious commandments. Most of them originate from the underprivileged and deprived section of society where a woman especially a daughter or a wife enjoys little respect and status. The socio-cultural background very much influences the way they evaluate and interpret the status and rights of women in our religion. Sadly, such biased and corrupted views are thrust rather totally blind, in religious matters to confront such views. It is ultimately the victims, our daughters, who suffer, being left at the mercy of fate. Ours is a ailing society. The cure has to come from within. We are all, in one way or another, at one level or another, responsible for this. Our apathy and our tendency to blame others for all the ills that face us shift control. In this way, we succeed in obtaining psychological relief as the burden and responsibility of bringing about a change has been conveniently shifted elsewhere. It is better to light one small candle than to curse the darkness. We need to realize that until we stop ceaselessly blaming others and instead take on the responsibility to bringing about the required social change upon our own selves, the birth of a daughter will continue to strike as a calamity in many homes, some parents may reluctantly accept it, the others may not, but the pain will be there all the same.

Leaving the country and exploring another part of the world for a week or two can do wonders for your stress. One person who knew she needed some time to herself was Zilla van den Born. The student decided that a vacation was on the cards, so she took some time away from school to go backpacking. However, all was not as it seemed. As an artistic person, Zilla is always on the lookout for new inspiration, and where better to get some than by immersing herself in new surroundings. The break from her school work would do wonders for her creativity, and potentially help her get better grades in the long run. After all, students get just as stressed as adults, so they all need a break too. Zilla made plans to start traveling on April 23, , with the intention of arriving back in Amsterdam sometime in June. Was she ready for this backpacking experience? If she was backpacking, the last thing she wanted was to have a lot of stuff to carry around with her. She was going to be gone for five weeks, which is a long time to be separated from the ones you love. Zilla wasted no time taking pictures to start documenting her adventure. Starting her adventure Before boarding for her flight, Zilla texted her parents to let them know that she was now on her way to Thailand. With so much to see in Thailand, she was quite frankly spoilt for choice. Documenting everything Zilla spent every day of her vacation snapping as many photos as she could. The extravagant photos started coming in thick and fast, leaving her parents fairly astounded. Phoning home While it might have seemed she was having a great time abroad, Zilla still made time to speak to her parents often. One of the first things she did upon arriving in Thailand was to skype with her family and show them that she was doing okay. Keeping in contact Zilla kept up these Skype calls for the duration of her stay in Southeast Asia. As she moved from country to country, she showed off the different hotel rooms she stayed in, and continued to fill them in on all her adventures. They wanted her to enjoy herself, and could see the impact that this well-deserved break was having on her mentally, emotionally and creatively. She posted so many amazing pictures that it was easy to pretend they were right there with her. Unfortunately for everyone else, they could only pretend that they were sunning themselves up on the beach and exploring ancient temples. In reality, they were all stuck at home dealing with their day-to-day lives. It was only Zilla that was getting to do all this stuff for real! right? However, as Zilla continued to post photos of her adventures, some of her friends started to become a little suspicious. The student was getting up to a lot on her travels, and each photo was as incredible as the last. Something seemed fishy about this vacation, and they were determined to get to the bottom of it. Hiding a secret As it turned out, her friends were right to question what was going on. However, once it was out there, her loved ones were stunned. It was a deceptive trick to play on the people she cares about, and pulling it off was no easy feat. How did she do it, though? Maintaining the ruse For all those weeks, Zilla had remained holed up in her apartment. The gorgeous hotel rooms and the multitude of photos were tricks that Zilla managed to create from the safety of her own home. To combat that problem, Zilla would don a big coat and dark sunglasses to hide her identity from the world. Keeping him in the loop Zilla essentially had all of her loved ones fooled, but there was one person who knew all along what the student was planning. Her boyfriend was the lucky one who received an insight into her faux vacation, and he helped her wherever possible. No-one else was quite so fortunate though. To say that they were upset by her manipulation would be an understatement. Art project What exactly drove Zilla to lie so profoundly to the people she cares about? Well, as it turns out, it was all part of an art project. The student wanted to prove how easy it is to distort reality, and she saw this as the best way to pull it off. She had them all fooled that she was really in Southeast Asia, which may now come back to bite her. It was relatively easy for her to create the illusion that she was away, despite the fact that it was all fantasy. We often compare ourselves unfavorably to others because of the things they post on social media, but now you know that everything might not always be as it seems. She had to wake up in the middle of the night for Skype sessions with her family, because she was supposed to be in a different time zone to them. She also had to put in a lot of effort to rearrange her apartment everytime she was supposedly in a new hotel, which ended up costing her a lot of money. Despite the difficulties, her ruse had worked, the project was successful, and now she had an amazing story to share. Lesson learned, for all those involved. People were stunned by what she had done, but also impressed that she had the skills to pull it off. People wondered if what she had done was really fair to her friends and family. In the weeks she was gone her family had likely been worried about her traveling alone in a foreign country, when she could have put their minds at ease. Not to mention, keeping up the deception was hard on Zilla as well, and she unnecessarily put herself through that. In a day and age where most people use social media as a method of communication, but also as a way to get their news stories, people felt that what Zilla had shown was very relevant. She proved just how easy it is to get caught up in pictures and stories, without ever knowing if they are real or not. In fact, a term has now been coined for it, fake-cation. Lots of people have had fun playing around with the photoshop features on their computers, and using the technology to their advantage. Not everyone went as Zilla went by transforming her apartment, some people just use the little things they had on hand. Like this guy who used just his fingers, computer, and phone, to make it look like they were at the beach. California dreaming A blogger and Instagram star from the U. As part of a project for Vice, he pretended to be embarking on a roadtrip across America, and even created a hashtag for the trip. However, unlike Zilla, he barely used photoshop, and often just reshared pictures that had been taken on previous trips, or taken by other people. One Kenyan woman named Sevelyn Gat simply wished that she could join her friends on their vacation, so she asked some friends to help her fake her dream trip to China. The photoshop was pretty bad, but it was sweet and meant to be aspirational. People loved that she was thinking of her dream, and one man even raised funds for her to go to China for real. False accomplishment One case of alleged photoshop still remains questionable. A couple from India claimed to be the first Indians to climb Mt. Everest and reach the summit, and even had the picture to prove it. However, after their photo circulated on the internet many began to question if it was actually authentic. Other hikers and mountaineers accused the couple of faking the picture, claiming that there were inconsistencies they noticed in it. The couple maintains it was real, so we may never really know. Tips for your fake-cation These days fake-cation is a well known term, and is even a popular hashtag on Twitter. Some publications, like BuzzFeed, even offer tips on how you can best present your fake-cation, and how to really make it look like you were there.

Simply follow me, and quote retweet this tweet with aossshorts and your best tactics advice, lore snippet or epic battlefield tale that will fit in a tweet. The competition runs to 3 March. All the details are in the tweet. The cover art is fantastic and I love the tone! The Daughters of Khaine hunt across the Mortal Realms for blood. The Daughters are organised according to the strongholds of the cult, so expect similar specific rules to Stormcast chambers or Kharadron Overlord skyports. There are also allegiance abilities, spell lores and more. You can expect new units – the Melusai, the Khinerai, an iron Avatar of Khaine – and changes to the rules for existing units. Daughters of Khaine lore and background The Daughters of Khaine are a sadistic cult worshipping the aelven god Khaine. Khaine, the Bloody-Handed god and Lord of Murder was the aelven god of violence, war and cruelty. In their worship of Khaine, the Daughters slaughter innocents and enemies alike in order to bathe in their blood and pursue the shards of their shattered god. Through this blood sacrifice, the Daughters gain the power of their enemies. This theme has really been brought alive by the art in the battletome. This slideshow requires JavaScript. Despite these bloodthirsty ways, the Daughters fight for Order, having no kin with the mindless forces of Destruction, bare nature of Death and an absolute hatred for Chaos, especially Slaanesh. The Daughters have established temples across the Mortal Realms, as well as populating the Shrouded Districts of Azyrheim. Unsurprisingly, they are viewed with great unease by the other inhabitants of the Mortal Realms and the free cities, especially when innocent people start disappearing. For more, check out the excellent video from writer and designer, Jeremy Vetock. And this great video from the background writers and design team! Morathi – the Shadow Queen Morathi, one of the foremost characters of the Warhammer world, has returned to the tabletop and the Mortal Realms as the High Oracle of Khaine. For those unaware, Khaine the Bloody-Handed god and Lord of Murder was the aelven god of violence, war and cruelty. A master schemer she has been high priestess for the aelven gods of old, served Slaanesh, and conspired to put her son Malekith on the Phoenix throne. Last seen in the End Times, when she was imprisoned by Slaanesh, she has now escaped, although not without being transformed by her tormentor. Once free, Morathi helped weave the enchantment that caught Slaanesh, with Malerion her son, Teclis and Tyrion – ancient aelven warriors reborn as gods. Morathi has survived through pure force of will and has made her base in Ulgu, the realm of shadows, lies and illusions a perfect fit! Morathi has now been spurned even by Malerion, who claimed the Shadowlands of Ulgu and the capital of Druchiroth for himself. Her ultimate aim is revenge and apotheosis. Morathi is vain, so maintains her aelven form as High Oracle, but is also mad for power. This model is simply a stunning example of the mastery of modern plastics achieved by Games Workshop. As the High Oracle, Morathi is an excellent commander and spellcaster with rules benefiting casting and unbinding. In this form, she has 6 wounds, but is also -1 to hit Enchanting Beauty and can only be allocated 3 wounds in any one turn the Iron Heart. These abilities increase her survivability, without making her unkillable. Given that she has 6 wounds, she will still be susceptible to an early double turn. This allows you to maximise the output of nearby Daughters of Khaine units by having two units shoot or pile in and attack in the hero phase. Also, if she has taken wounds as the High Oracle, there is a risk that she will lose control and transform regardless of whether you want her too. As the Shadow Queen, Morathi has 12 wounds although she apparently carries over wounds taken as the High Oracle. Her short range shooting attack allows her to pick out individual models easily, such as Standard Bearers, Starsoul Maces etc. When Morathi transforms, she loses her command ability and the benefits to casting, but retains the Iron Heart. I can definitely see her being a powerful force in Duality of Death. It will take four turns to kill her with normal damage. I am interested to see how the transformation works in terms of model movement – do models in base contact or within a certain distance get a free push away? Daughters of Khaine allegiance abilities The Daughters of Khaine are a warrior order and fanatical cult. The Daughters also have the Blood Rites battle trait which means the army become stronger after each battle round as the fight lengthens, and the blood lust rises, so does the power of the army. The key will be keeping your lightly armoured units alive long enough to benefit! Daughters of Khaine spells and prayers The Daughters of Khaine have brought with them the two ancient traditions of the Khainite cults and the dark magics of Ulgu, the Realm of Shadows. Mindrazor improves the rend and damage output of the target Daughters of Khaine unit. The Withering improves your ability to wound a target unit. And Pit of Shades dishes out mortal wounds against slow moving enemy units. Blessing of Khaine improves the resilience of one of your units. Daughters of Khaine units.

Phliasian Asopus[edit] Pausanias 2. Diodorus Siculus 4,72 similarly presents Asopus here son of Oceanus and Tethys as a settler in Phlius and wife of Metope daughter of Ladon , presumably here and elsewhere the Arcadian river Ladon. Asopus cannot discover what has become of them until the seer Acraephen otherwise unknown tells him that the gods Eros and Aphrodite persuaded the four gods to come secretly to his house and steal his nine daughters. He advises Asopus to yield to the immortals and cease grieving since he is father-in-law to gods. This hints that perhaps, for Corinna, Asopus himself is not a god. Euboea is near Boeotia, but Salamis and Aegina are regions that would perhaps associate better with the Phliasian Asopus. Korkyra Corfu is definitely Corinthian rather than Boeotian. Sinope is surely the colony of Sinope on the Black Sea founded from Miletus. It is notable that tradition as it comes down to us does not record any children resulting from a union of gods with Thebe, Plataea, Thespia or Tanagra and only Diodorus 4. Asopus is often clearly the Phliasian Asopus so indicated by Pherecydes but not always so. Asopus chases after Zeus and his daughter until Zeus turns upon him and strikes him with a thunderbolt, whence ever after Asopus is lame and flows very slowly, a feature ascribed to both the Boeotian and Phliasian Asopus. In these tales Asopus discovers the truth about the abduction from Sisyphus , King of Corinth in return for creating a spring on the Corinthian Acropolis. This spring, according to Pausanias 2. But it introduces Chalcis which was the chief city of Boeotia and may represent Boeotia. But Asopis may mean Asopian and be an epithet for one of the other known daughters. Ovid in his poem Metamorphoses twice 6. He mentions no dispute about the others which suggests that in his time the assignment of Aegina to the Phliasian Asopus was generally admitted. It seems the Phliasiens were insistent that Thebe belonged to their Asopus. Nothing else has survived about this Pelagon. Of Ismenus, Diodorus states only that he emigrated to Boeotia and settled near the Boeotian river, which was afterwards named Ismenus from his name.
