The history and legend of these rugged and beautiful mountains continues to captivate the imagination of those who enjoy them. Contemporary tales of lost treasure in the Superstition Wilderness do not haunt the minds of treasure hunters as much as old stories of lost gold in the region. Many of these tales are far different than the ordinary tales of lost gold. It is about a man in search of self-identity, and he had spent decades trying to find his niche in life. He was the son of an Italian miner and a Tarahumara Indian. As a child Ted found painting with different colors an interesting challenge. He loved to collect colored rocks from around the hills near Morenci. This interest in color later in life helped him to create some of his famous paintings. DeGrazia, like most artists, had a difficult time finding his place in the real world. He called it the Gallery in the Sun. He said when he was attending the University of Arizona he worked a summer helping some bootleggers in the Superstition Mountains near a place called Whiskey Springs. This early introduction to the myriad of canyons and towering spires overwhelmed his imagination. He returned to the Superstition Mountains often during the remainder his life. He painted the "Dutchman" series, wrote a book about Superstition Mountain, guided people through the mountains and told stories about the mountains. He organized a special pack trip with Billy Clark Crader around May 12, The purpose of the trip was to haul several of his paintings and sketches into the Superstition Wilderness and burn them in protest of the Inheritance Tax. The following are quotes from various newspapers about the trip into the Superstition Wilderness and the hiding of the paintings: Burns Paintings," on May 15, Tax laws, the Phoenix Gazette reported yesterday. The paintings and sketches DeGrazia burned and hid that day were from his early days as an artist. A witness claims DeGrazia burned two insignificant oils, ink and pencil sketches. The number of paintings, ink and pencil sketches burned is still conjecture among many people. The action of Ted DeGrazia in May of is what creates legends of lost treasures. Others claim all he buried were insignificant pencil sketches. Also there are those in Apache Junction who know exactly who was there and how long they stayed. Again there are many stories still emerging about others who claim they helped DeGrazia bury his oil paintings. It is not the truth. Ted DeGrazia was brilliant entrepreneur and thoroughly understood business, marketing and the promotion of a product. I personally leave it up to a good businessman to say whether or not he burned one or two million dollars worth of oil paintings and ink sketches at Angel Spring or even hid an equal number. Not too long ago a map was floating around Apache Junction attributed to Bob Ward. Some claimed Ward was with Ted DeGrazia when he hid the paintings. I will leave that up to those who really know. Yes, DeGrazia was an unimaginable eccentric in many ways, but he was always in control of his business, he thoroughly understood marketing of his own talent, and knew how to manipulate his associates. I knew DeGrazia, but I am not too sure I knew him at all. He would stop at my home in the late seventies wanting me to work on his old International Travel-All. I would take a screwdriver and tap on it and the engine would run smoothly again. Ted always had to have a good reason to stop. His legacy and the legacy of his adopted mountains will live on forever in America and throughout the world. For information call the museum at

The game was also drawing comparisons to another postapocalyptic game from id Software. Other exaggerated elements included exploding enemies, extreme bosses, and "crazy vagina monsters"--a reference to one hulking creature with a massive sideways maw. The hunter Mordechai was a lot brawnier, even after the art shift. However, by that point, Gearbox had painted itself into a corner. To find a solution, they had to look at three factors: So that left quality, which they felt could be improved "with the right approach. If his team could give the game the same sort of ink-lined, quasi-comic-book look as the concept art, they would have the fabled "Purple Cow," a business concept propagated by author Seth Godin. He and the other Gearbox executives also wanted to prevent a "producer riot" among the employees who had worked on the game for going on three years. When the prototype was revealed, almost everyone was enthusiastic for the project, including the 2K Games team, which backed the switch wholeheartedly. However, the original art director grew so disenchanted that all her prior work was being discarded that she eventually quit the project, left Gearbox, and got out of the game industry altogether. However, the enthusiasm for the new direction was so great internally that people working on other projects were clamoring to help out on Borderlands during their spare time. Neumann went to Jeremy Cook, one of his top gameplay designers, and asked for abilities that had the same fantastical element as magic in fantasy RPGs. The runner vehicles also looked much the same in both art styles. Gearbox also saved time and money by importing technology from other Gearbox projects, such as Brothers in Arms: They also used shortcuts to produce the results they wanted, such as creating a fiction about a stationary moon to create a single, fixed light source in the sky that yielded dramatic shadows. The open-turreted runners also remained largely identical, albeit under the new concept-art skin. There were also happy accidents along the way: The original claptrap sketch. In conclusion, the trio agreed that the key was to let Gearbox team members come up with solutions independently. Neumann said it best when he paraphrased a comment by the absent Pitchford:
