2: August 6, A Different Kind of Courage – Today in History

There is a different kind of courage that is associated with running a business, or living the life of an artist, or choosing a vegan lifestyle and that is the courage to avoid the urge to take the easier path.

We all know that we need courage to step up and make the most out of our lives, but what is courage? Is the courage it takes to ride a roller coaster the same as it is to ask someone to dance? If you can jump out of an aircraft, can you also swim with sharks or speak in public? If you look at the different actions in life that require an element of bravery and courage to overcome the fear associated to the task then you can effectively classify them into three different groups. These classifications are related to how much courage or more importantly, for how long, one needs to be successful. Each of these activities just needs a short, intense period of courage, just one moment of bravery to begin the action. Once the action has started, there is no going back, the hard work is done. After all, you cannot change your mind half way through a bungee jump. This kind of bravery is related to your emotional state, and knowing how to get into a peak state is vital to being successful with these kind of tasks. Your state is related to two elements; your physiology and your focus. All you have to do is think about the physiology of someone who looks confident, adopt the same posture and you will feel an element of confidence. Focus is a slightly more complicated element, but there are two phrases that will hopefully simplify it somewhat. Over time that state can fade, the voices in your head can get a little louder and it becomes a lot easier to talk yourself out of completing a task. Think about what it takes to approach a stranger and ask them for a dance, singing karaoke or getting off the sofa and going for a run. Just literally twenty seconds of just embarrassing bravery. And I promise you, something great will come of it. He is right, you have to be prepared to be embarrassed or a little insane, but the rewards for this kind of courage are so much greater. So how do you develop 20 seconds of courage? That is why you see people getting right to the end of the line and then bailing last minute as these thoughts have just taken them over completely. This is where you use that one question. After all, these things are tested every day. I mean, they are designed for people of all sizes. Remember, courage can only happen in the presence of fear, they rely on each other to exist. Your job is to focus beyond the fear. What would happen if you did complete the task in the face of your fear? Once you get used to the voices in your head and the questions they ask, you will find it easier and easier to reframe and refocus them. Perhaps you then need the one moment of bravery to take the first step, but after that, its all in your head. Is there a different kind of bravery that applies to longer term challenges? The answer is yes and no. The answer is no because all big goals can be broken down into smaller constituent parts. Building a business involves selling, recruiting, marketing and production, all of which require day to day elements of courage and bravery. Sales in particular requires bravery to continually face potential rejection on a daily basis. Marketers are responsible for making the best possible budget decisions but could get it wrong. Each action within the growth of a business requires moments of bravery and 20 seconds of courage every single day and so the above techniques will help extremely well in these situations. However, the answer is also yes. There is a different kind of courage that is associated with running a business, or living the life of an artist, or choosing a vegan lifestyle and that is the courage to avoid the urge to take the easier path. Every business owner has had the thought of going back to the job, of not having to worry about staff and the idea of paid holidays, especially when times get tough. Choosing to eat healthy can seem impossible when you are surrounded by fast food, vending machines and take aways and sometimes it can seem as though you are missing out. In these situations, no one around you would blame you for taking the easier path. The people around you often just want to see you happy, and they may not understand the struggle you are putting yourself through. However, inside of you there is a level of determination that only others with the same feeling can understand. Something burns inside of you that ensure you stay on this path. You understand that the biggest goals with the most reward also bring with it high levels of resistance, fear and hesitation. However, you have made that decision that this is how you are going to live your life, and I applaud you. Living a lifetime on purpose requires more than just mastering the moments of bravery and the 20 seconds of courage. It takes commitment to your dream and passion and the ability to maintain the vision that is your long term success. Now you know the areas you need to work on, begin today to develop your levels of courage and bravery. 3: Courage to Be Safe® - Everyone Goes Home

There are different types of courage, ranging from physical strength and endurance to mental stamina and innovation. The below quotes demonstrate six different ways in which we define courage.

It was the first day of the new school year and it had been very exciting. Going back to school in September was always cool. Seeing old friends, making new ones and a new teacher was exciting in deed. We had a bunch of new kids, and my teacher seems very nice too". She thought her mum was the smartest person in the world, but sometimes she could be pretty dumb too! Besides that, there was a large tree in the back with a swing on it. Therefore, she was almost always allowed to go over there. It gave the two mothers some time to themselves since the girls kept each other occupied in the back. Fortunately, they lived on a side street, and there was almost never any traffic, but Rebecca looked both ways anyway. So you can see, she really was growing up and remembered what she was supposed to do. It was because of the tree. To that, Rebecca only frowned. It had become their special place where they could sit and talk, and no one could see or hear them. From there, they could spy on everyone without worrying about anyone seeing them. He was the most fun to spy on, but he also got the angriest whenever they got caught. Did you see how she was dressed"? Sometimes Sheila could be a little stuck up, but she was still fun to be with. Besides, she liked to climb trees and play football, and Rebecca liked that about her. Just wait until things settle down some, and she starts handing out homework. Rebecca only nodded her head. After all, it had only been the first day, and everyone was always extra nice the first few days of the new school year. Still, she thought her friend was wrong about Ms Hathaway. At least, she hoped so. There was a new girl in the classroom the next day. Her name was Mary Brown, and unlike the others in the class, Mary was very quiet. Not only that, but she had the most hideous scar on her upper lip. And did you see her clothes? Her uniform looks like she wore it last year. Why, I dress my dolls better than that"! Sheila then tried mimicking the way Mary Brown talked, and then giving up, she laughed. Rebecca was quiet though. That was the day when they would be able to join a football team in the youth league. They then laughed about how clumsy the boys were the previous year, and for the moment, Mary Brown was forgotten, but later that evening, Rebecca thought a lot about the new girl at school. Chapter 2 By the next morning, Rebecca had forgotten all about Mary Brown until she saw the new girl in the classroom. The day began as usual, and as the hours passed, Rebecca was pleased to find that Ms Hathaway was still being nice. That will be the real test". Like before, Mary Brown sat by herself at lunch, and the other kids began calling her "split lips" behind her back. It was the same during play time too. No one wanted old split lips to be on their team when they played football either. She just swung back and forth by herself on a swing most of the time. Rebecca was thinking about going over to talk to her, but just then, Sheila pulled on her arm saying, "Come on. The next day, Ms Hathaway did give out some homework. Sheila giggled and rolled her eyes. To her surprise, she found they were having fish for dinner, and whenever they have fish, Rebecca always snuck some for her cat Lucy, and now that she has a new kitten named Fiona, she had to sneak extra for her too. Fortunately, her mum never seemed to notice and Rebecca was certain that her two little friends appreciated it. The little black kitten quickly ate the fish and blinked her green eyes at Rebecca as if to say, "Thank you". Rebecca then went to find her older cat Lucy and give her the rest of the fish. It was a bit of trouble sometimes, but Rebecca loved them both anyway. School always seemed better on Fridays, and everyone seemed happier. Even the teachers were in a better mood, but that Friday, Ms Hathaway had a surprise for them. It was a quiz with ten questions about their reading assignment! This time, when Rebecca looked over at Mary Brown and saw her sitting by herself, she began to feel sorry for her. Anyway, I feel sorry for her". As usual, the weekend went by way too fast. Rebecca and her mum did the laundry together, and they went grocery shopping, and the next thing she knew it was time to go to school! Rebecca rolled her eyes. They were just playing. Her mum always pretended to get angry when Rebecca mentioned how old her mother was. It was sort of a game betwixt them. Everyone was getting used to the new school year now, and things were becoming routine, but when lunch came this time, Rebecca was determined to talk to Mary Brown. Sharon was nine and had failed her second year so she was the oldest girl in their class. Everyone listened to her, and she was a bad person to cross. Both girls were staring at her, and in the end Rebecca thought it best to talk about it to her mum before she did anything that could cause her a lot of trouble with the other girls in her class. So, giving Mary Brown a final look, she went outside with Sheila and the other girls. Chapter 3 Later that day, when Rebecca got home the first thing she had to do of course was her homework assignment. This time, she had to write a poem. Rebecca thought about what Ms Hathaway said, and while she was changing out of her uniform she thought of the night her dad brought home Fiona. Her father works a lot and never seems to be home, but he loves her dearly and was always trying to make it up to her for not being around more. That was the reason why he surprised her one evening with a new kitten. He knew her other cat Lucy was getting older, and he knew Rebecca wanted another one. As Rebecca thought about all this, she watched Fiona slowly sneak up on a beetle that had found its way into the bedroom. The bug had flown to the edge of the bed, and just as the kitten pounced on it, the thing suddenly flew away, and Fiona somersaulted off the bed and onto the floor. The little kitten landed on all four of her paws and looked around as if to say, "What happened"? Rebecca laughed so hard she almost fell down, and when she was able to stop laughing, she looked at her kitten and said, "Silly cat"! That was when she decided to write a poem about Fiona. It took a lot of thought and several tries, but in the end, this is what she wrote: My kitten plays with the toys me and my mum got her My kitten is tired; she curls up on my bed By Rebecca After doing her homework, Rebecca decided not to go across the street to play with Sheila. Instead, she stayed inside and played with Fiona. Later, she found Lucy and played with her too. Rebecca was even more surprised to see her dad sitting at the table. It was always the first question he asked as they sat down to dinner. Rebecca frowned before telling what had happened at school. Her father thought a moment, and after swallowing his food, her dad asked, "Rebecca, what do you think courage means"? That is one kind of courage", replied her dad. So what do you think you should do"? What does your heart tell you to do"? Everyone is afraid sometimes", explained her father. That is a different kind of courage. It is called moral courage". Instead, she ignored their scowls and went right across the room to where Mary Brown was sitting by herself. You can be on my team. Mary Brown was right. As it turned out, Mary Brown was an even better player than Rebecca was! The new girl had very good control of the ball, and she had a way of batting it with the side of her foot which caused the ball to suddenly go in a different direction than everyone expected. Mary was able to score three times that way, and she was such a good player, that by the end of play time, everyone wanted to be her friend! And that is how Rebecca gained a new best friend and learned that there was more than one kind of courage.

For twenty-eight months these guys guarded their seed bank, without eating so much as a grain. In the world of plant biology, diversity can literally mean the difference between feast and famine. The Irish Potato Famine of the mid-nineteenth century resulted from the failure of a single crop. The direct cause was the water mold Phytophthora infestans, but the real culprit might have been the over-reliance on a single strain of potato. A million Irish starved to death and another two million departed, never to return, in a country starting out with barely 8. Blight, climate disruption and insects are but a few of the causes. Often, the only solution was having enough food-source variety that no single crop failure could lead to starvation. Nikolai Ivanovich Vavilov was a Russian botanist and plant biologist. Nikolai Vavilov Over a lifetime of study of phytopathology and plant immunity, Vavilov organized expeditions and collected plant specimens from every corner of the world. Nikolai Vavilov was a man of pure science. Not so his young protégé, Trofim Denisovich Lysenko. By this theory, rye could transform into wheat, wheat into barley, and weeds somehow transmuted into edible food grains. Nevertheless, Lysenko was hailed as a hero of Soviet agriculture, particularly in light of the disastrous collectivization efforts of the late 1920s. A shameless sycophant and toady to Communist ideology, Lysenko gained status among party officials with one harebrained proposition after another, following one after another, far too quickly to be disproven by the patient observation of reputable scientific method. At this time, the hottest ideas in plant genetics were emerging from biological studies of Drosophila melanogaster, the common fruit fly. As director of the Soviet Academy of Agricultural Sciences, Lysenko put his theories to work, with unsurprisingly dismal results. There had to be scapegoats. Note the several deep scars on his right cheek, indicating severe beatings sustained by the scientist in prison. On August 6, 1945, Vavilov was on expedition in Ukraine, collecting specimens when he was snatched up and driven away in a black sedan, his staff helpless to intervene. Vavilov was sentenced to death in 1940 with sentence later commuted to twenty years. In January 1943, this man whose scientific work was at least as important as that of Norman Borlaug, starved to death in a Soviet Gulag. Nikolai Vavilov had collected some 15,000 specimens of edible fruits, seeds and tubers over the years, which now sat in a Leningrad basement. The siege of Leningrad lasted for twenty-eight months. Hunger soon took hold and, before it was over, more than a million Leningrad residents starved to death. Soviet authorities had ordered the removal of art from the Hermitage prior to the siege, but not these botanical specimens. They locked themselves in the basement with their trove and took turns standing guard, protecting future food crops and the survival of untold millions, yet unborn. These guys had stood guard over their seed bank for twenty-eight months, without eating so much as a grain. The verdict against Nikolai Vavilov was set aside in 1956, one of thousands of reversals of Stalin era death sentences. In time he would come to be seen as a hero of Soviet-era science. Trofim Lysenko would outlive his benefactor Stalin, and retained influence into the era of Nikita Khrushchev. Lysenkoism was officially renounced in 1964, the bureaucrat denounced by physicist and human rights activist, Andrei Sakharov. The disgraced apparatchik died in 1971. It took Soviet media two days to so much as mention his passing, with a small notice printed in the broadsheet, Izvestia. In the funhouse mirror world of the Soviet Union, the future was always known. It was the past, that was subject to change. Still home to the largest collection of plant genetic material in the world, the N. Vavilov Institute of Plant Industry in St. Petersburg was scheduled to be razed in 1978, to make way for luxury housing. Scientists from around the world petitioned Russian President Dmitri Medvedev to rethink the decision, and not destroy the largest collection of European fruits and berries in the world. But hell, he got himself a postage stamp, in

5: Different Kind of Courage (Darkover Series) by Mercedes Lackey

As I read back over some of the courage-themed articles here at Be Leaderly, I realized that there are many different types of courage that emerging leaders must draw from, in order to successfully make the leap into leadership. Here are eight types of courage you'll need if you aspire to lead.

A lowly water tender, he held one of the dirtiest jobs in the US Navy: The story of that fateful day is retold in a new book, The Unknowns: As a result of their bravery, these eight men were selected to serve as Body Bearers at the ceremony where the Unknown Soldier was laid to rest at Arlington Cemetery. He spent his shifts just inches away from the hell-like blast furnaces that powered the mighty steamer, which was nearly as large as the Titanic. Sweat poured down his body, making rivulets in the encrusted coal dust that he could never fully wash away. Other than the rainbow which arced across the dawn sky – a sign veteran mariners considered a warning of impending doom – it seemed like just another average day. Mount Vernon was steaming back across the Atlantic toward New York, having delivered hundreds of American fighters to France. But the ship was far from empty. A worldwide influenza epidemic was raging, and the steamer, like many others, had become a plague ship. With the soldiers trapped in tight quarters, Spanish influenza quickly spread throughout the ship, leading to grave illness or even death. Many of those who had set out on the journey to France well were no longer capable of fighting, and as a result, were now heading back home. But that morning, a massive explosion suddenly rocked the ship. As the power cut out, the overhead lights went dark. A shower of scalding coal dust and debris rained down on his head, scorching his body as the searing heat burned his throat and lungs. Before he could catch his breath, a torrent of seawater rushed into the compartment. Thirty thousand tons of metal were lifted, twisted, cracked, and bent from the explosion. Thousands of gallons of water rushed into the ship. Within minutes, Mount Vernon, sinking fast, dangerously rode ten feet below her normal waterline. Fatefully, the explosive had struck some of the fire rooms and boilers, where the stores of coal compounded the force of the blast. The fire room was well below the waterline, making it extremely likely that he could drown in the flood of water at any second. Plus, the fire from the initial explosion was spreading in the dusty air of the fire rooms, leading to secondary explosions. His only hope for escape was to get away from the boilers and stored coal as quickly as possible. And that duty was to close the watertight doors. The fire room connected to an enormous coal bunker, and if that compartment filled with water, it would be enough to send the ship to the bottom of the ocean, not to mention drowning the men currently inside the room. Because the blast had twisted the metal, he had to bring all his considerable strength to bear to get the handle to turn. In recognition of his incredible devotion to duty, he received the Distinguished Service Medal. And General Pershing selected him for one of the greatest honors of all: When he did, he returned to work, shoveling coal to transport AEF soldiers across the sea to fight in Europe. Little is known of his life after the war, but his legacy remains as a symbol of the heroic sacrifices ordinary Americans were willing to make when confronted with extraordinary circumstances. He is the author of eleven books. The Unknowns is his newest bestselling book. Navy on Monday May 21 noon.
