Gabriel has asked that a portion of his fees for his column be donated to the Charities Aid Foundation http: Computers and mobile phones are turning us into lazy writers, ruining our spelling and grammar and reducing our attention span. We are facing a communications crisis. Yet one thing is undeniable. Social networking sites, blogs, instant messaging and e-mail are actually improving our ability to reach out to our fellow man. The US presidential election is a great showcase of modern-day communicators. Never before has an election created such an unprecedented volume of interest across the four corners of the globe. As the campaign unfolded, blogs, popular networking and photo-sharing sites were abuzz with first-hand accounts, pictures and updates. Through their mobile phones and PCs, people instantly shared moments of historyin-the-making with each other. Another example, this time closer to home. The stream of information soon became a hub for coordinating rescue and relief efforts for those who had access to the internet. The phone and the PC became critical communication tools for survival. On a personal level, relationships of all types â€” romantic, classmates, 9 family, co-workers â€” have been kept alive and even resurrected thanks to modern technology. For those with family members or partners far away, the PC and the phone are completely essential in staying connected. Think back to the days when we left home to go to university or work overseas. The most cost-effective means to communicate was through letters. When we did get round to writing them, these often arrived weeks after they were written, resulting in long stretches of silence. Today people have a huge choice in how they express themselves, be it using words, photos, videos, audio clips, even emoticons. We have different networks for different needs; tracing old friends, finding videos, outreaching to potential employers, connecting with travellers. The issue then becomes how we manage all this information and not get overburdened. You guessed it – there are services out there that even help with that. For example, with 10 Windows Live, you can aggregate updates from different social networks into one place, providing a streamlined, holistic view and an easy way to manage multiple contacts and the streams of information. Of course, there has to be a balance. There are many occasions when we should leave our phones and PCs out of reach, for uninterrupted human-to-human interaction. I thoroughly advocate and encourage the discipline and etiquette of usage, yet the benefits of the phone and the PC far outweigh the annoyances. Speakers clambered onto the stage and blissfully extolled the blessings of having faith in one another. By the fifth one, I felt like stealing their wallets. Then it was my turn. I went to the podium and spoke two words: Why did those words create such mirth? It may have been the devastatingly brilliant ironic tone of my voice. Or it may have been the fact that I was wearing a badge that read: Humour is a strange thing. Trust is even stranger. Stories The year was Readers were sending in their hysterical true stories in droves, and the editors here had a revelation: One of the early stories: The lobsterman shakes his head. But the lobsters do. Edited by Jill Krasny

1. We were really confused. While transcribing medical audiotapes, a colleague came upon the following garbled diagnosis: After listening to the tape, he shook his head. Hospital regulations require a wheelchair for patients being discharged. After a chat about rules being rules, he reluctantly let me wheel him to the elevator. On the way down, I asked if his wife was meeting him. One crazy day in our pediatric clinic saw me hand a young patient a urine sample container and tell him to fill it up in the bathroom. I was already a nervous wreck about my upcoming surgery. Unable to bear it any longer, I tapped one of them on the shoulder. My husband decided to install a light switch in our master bedroom. Cutting into the wall, he discovered a stash of bottles and boxes. The minute I walked into the post office, the postmaster noticed the new earrings my husband had given me. When a woman in my office recently became engaged, a colleague offered her some advice. We rushed our four-year-old son, Ben, to the emergency room with a terrible cough, high fever, and vomiting. The doctor did an exam, then asked Ben what bothered him the most. After thinking it over, Ben said hoarsely, "I would have to say my little sister. The best advice I ever received came to me from my ensign when I was a Wave at boot camp. A friend and I were hitchhiking, but no one would stop. With that, my friend scrawled on a piece of cardboard: A male friend of mine, an engineer at an aircraft company, works for a woman supervisor. One day, her latest button, "Adam was a rough draft," proved too much for my friend. The next day, he showed up at work sporting his own button: The teacher in one of our local grade schools was showing a copy of the Declaration of Independence to her pupils. It passed from desk to desk and finally to Luigi, a first-generation American. The boy studied the document reverently. Then, before passing it on, he gravely added his own signature. On the way back from a Cub Scouts meeting, my grandson asked my son the question. After my son hemmed and hawed for a while, my grandson finally spoke up in disgust. Driving with my two young boys to a funeral, I tried to prepare them by talking about burial and what we believe happens after death. The boys behaved well during the service. In a loud voice, my four-year-old asked, "Mom? Someone had placed a party hat on its head. Her father knelt beside her and explained why some people hunt animals. On the last night of our childbirth classes, our teacher took us to see the maternity center. We were gathered by the door when a woman, clearly in labor, and her nervous husband came rushing in. When he saw our group of pregnant women, he panicked: Look at the size of that line! We had just finished listening to an old Simon and Garfunkel tune when my young daughter asked, "Well, did he? A woman from our office brought in her new bundle of joy along with her seven-year-old son. Everyone gathered around the baby, and the little boy asked, "Mommy, can I have some money to buy a soda? Unfazed, the manager just looked at her. It was for a wastewater plant operator. Among the job requirements: My first job was wrapping hams at a meatpacking plant. One day, I was heading out the main gate right behind a woman who was rather rotund. Or so I thought. Just as she passed the guard shack, a ham dropped from her skirt. Before the guard could react, she wheeled around, shouting, "All right, who threw the ham? While I was shopping in a pharmacy, a couple of teenagers came in. They were dressed in leather, chains, and safety pins. Suddenly the boy picked up a pair of sunglasses and tried them on. My brother Jim was hired by a government agency and assigned to a small office cubicle in a large area. At the end of his first day, he realized he had no idea how to get out. He wandered around, lost in the maze of cubicles and corridors. Just as panic began to set in, he came upon another employee in a cubicle. The fellow smiled and said, "No cheese for you. I am five feet three inches tall and pleasingly plump. After I had a minor accident, my mother accompanied me to the emergency room. The triage nurse asked for my height and weight, and I blurted out, "Five-foot-eight and pounds. Anytime companies merge, employees worry about layoffs. When the company I work for was bought, I was no exception. Our first day at a resort, my wife and I decided to hit the beach. When I went back to our room to get something to drink, one of the hotel maids was making our bed. I grabbed my cooler and was on my way out when I paused and asked, "Can we drink beer on the beach? My friend John and I, determined to see the world, signed on to a Norwegian freighter as deckhands. As the helm swung freely, the mate politely asked, "Could you bring the ship with you? Sitting in coach during a lengthy flight, my wife and I heard a flight attendant ask the high-paying passengers in first class, "Would you care for Chardonnay or Burgundy? We have white and red. The TV set was pulled away from the wall, and he was staring at the mass of tangled wires spilling out the back of it. He looked absolutely overwhelmed. My something friend Nancy and I decided to introduce her mother to the magic of the Internet. Our first move was to access the popular Ask Jeeves site, and we told her it could answer any question she had. Think of something to ask it. A pastor I know has a standard liturgy for funerals. To personalize each service, he uses the Find and Replace command on his computer to replace the name of the deceased from the previous funeral with the name of the deceased for the upcoming one. Recently, he had to replace the name Mary with Edna. I feel inadequate when talking with a mechanic, so when my vehicle started making a strange noise, I sought help from a friend. A car nut, he told me how to explain the difficulty when I took it in for repair. At the shop, I proudly recited, "The timing is off, and there are premature detonations, which may damage the valves. My friend was flabbergasted. Halfway through dinner one night, our friend Jim told us of his days playing football in college as a defensive lineman. Strolling through town, I saw a road worker printing a sign that read "Raised Manhole Ahead. The sign, he assured me, would be changed. Later that day, the sign was corrected. It now read "Raised Menhole Ahead. The nurse reading it over noticed my unusual name. These newspaper editors stand corrected. The local market has a bin where employees keep returned items. The bin is labeled "Spoils. It was an absolutely crazy evening at our emergency clinic. The doctor on duty was being bombarded with questions, given forms to fill out, and even asked for his dinner order. At 82 years old, my husband applied for his first passport. He was told he would need a birth certificate, but his birth had never been officially registered.

Reader's Digest: Best Remedies July 28, Whether depression is new to you or a condition that's been creeping up for years, there are plenty of strategies worth discussing with your doctor. Here are 13 depression treatments that can help you get back on track.

After all, she lived in Marin County, California, where breast cancer rates are among the highest in the country. Still, she was determined to do whatever she could to protect herself. She ate right and exercised, and every year, she went into San Francisco to get a mammogram. An ultrasensitive digital mammogram showed a suspicious spot on her left breast. A biopsy confirmed it was cancer. Fortunately, the surgeon told her, it had been caught early: She had ductal carcinoma in situ, or DCIS, which meant that the cancer was still confined to a single milk duct. That all sounded great, Bull recalls, until the surgeon told her that there was no way to know whether her cancer would turn out to be the lazy, nonthreatening type of DCIS or the potentially invasive kind. She needed a lumpectomy, he told her, and should also consider undergoing radiation and taking the drug tamoxifen. Bull agonized over the decision for two weeks but in the end went ahead with the lumpectomy and radiation. With two clean mammograms behind her, Bull feels lucky. They say that yearly mammograms are not nearly as effective at reducing the risk of dying of breast cancer as most women think, and that mammography leads many women to get unnecessary treatment — especially those diagnosed with DCIS. The problem is bigger than just mammography: And they have similarly grim things to say about other widely used cancer screening tests. Their view stands in stark contrast to the message being put out by groups like the American Cancer Society and even the federal government, which say that finding and treating tumors as early as possible is the surest way to avoid a cancer death. Surgery for prostate cancer leaves 60 percent of men unable to have an erection. For that matter, some of the screening tests themselves carry risks: Up to 5 out of every 1, people who get a colonoscopy have a serious complication, such as a colon perforation or major bleeding. Most people diagnosed with cancer undoubtedly see these risks as the price they must pay to avoid dying of cancer. The bottom line, says researcher Floyd Fowler, Jr. After all, smaller cancers are easier to cut out. A brain tumor, for example, can cause devastating harm when it grows big enough to squeeze healthy tissue inside the skull. But most cancers threaten life only after a few cells break free and travel through the bloodstream or lymph fluid to set up shop in another part of the body. And even powerful chemotherapy drugs are often unable to kill every last errant cell. Physicians used to think that a tumor needed to get to a certain size before it would spread. They begin metastasizing when they consist of only a few million cells, which sounds like a lot but is smaller than the period at the end of this sentence — too small to detect with most screening tests. The flip side of this problem is that many screening tests do a great job at catching cancers that would never have caused problems and could simply have been left alone. This notion violates most of what we think we know about cancer, says Dr. Kramer, because most of what we know is based on the tumors that cause harm. If you think of all the different varieties of cancer as making up an iceberg, cancers that cause symptoms represent only the part of the berg above the waterline. For most of human history, these were the only tumors we knew anything about: Evidence from autopsies, for instance: In one study, postmortem exams showed that nearly 9 percent of women of all ages who died of any cause other than breast cancer had undiagnosed DCIS. Among women from Denmark, where mammography is not as common as it is here, a whopping 39 percent of middle-aged women who died of other causes had undetected breast cancers. Similarly, says outcomes researcher Dr. Welch, a study found that 60 percent of men over age 60 have undetected prostate cancer — yet only about 3 percent of deaths in men are due to prostate cancer. So screening tests raise red flags about cancers destined to loll about quietly, causing no problems. They also blare the alarm about cancers that would actually go away on their own — because, in fact, some cancers simply disappear. Brandon Connor, now age seven, was suspected of having cancer even before he was born. Doctors made a tentative diagnosis of neuroblastoma, a nervous system cancer. Neuroblastoma comes in two forms, one of which is deadly. Finally, the doctors advised the Connors to go ahead with surgery. The day before the operation, though, the surgeon ordered one last imaging test. The neuroblastoma was gone. Today, physicians know that many neuroblastomas regress on their own during infancy or early childhood. No one intentionally prescribes unnecessary treatment, of course. Treatment can exact a profound toll. Take the case of George Brown. At 75, Brown was still a practicing lawyer in Denver last year when he was diagnosed with prostate cancer. His doctor prescribed Lupron to block production of testosterone which many prostate tumors need in order to grow. I was having hot and cold flashes. I cried at everything. He is now facing another round of a different testosterone-blocking drug. Despite his troubles, Brown believes his care was lifesaving. Does Screening Save Lives? For many people, even serious side effects like the ones Brown suffered would be worth putting up with if the treatment reduced their risk of dying of cancer. Yet only one cancer screening test, the venerable Pap smear, has truly slashed the risk of death. Between and , according to the American Cancer Society, Pap smears cut the death rate for cervical cancer by 74 percent, and deaths have continued to decline each year. But no other test has had such a powerful effect. Between and , the latest year for which statistics are available, the death rate dropped from 31 per , men to Medicare patients in Seattle were five times more likely than those in Connecticut to get PSA testing between and and were also more likely to have surgery and radiation for prostate cancer. But when researchers followed up through , they found the Seattle men were just as likely to die of prostate cancer. A Prescription for Health in an Over-treated America. That means a year-old who gets regular mammograms shaves her risk of dying of the disease in the next decade from 7 per 1, to 6 per 1, It allows the doctor to remove polyps, growths that can turn into cancer. The best estimates suggest that colonoscopy can cut the risk of death from colon cancer by as much as 60 percent. The average woman has a 2. So of all the things that can kill her, this will be the culprit about 2. It depends on many factors, including how old you are, what other diseases you have, and what you value most in terms of your health. Dennis Fryback, PhD, is a former member of the U. Preventive Services Task Force, a group of experts convened by the federal government to make recommendations about screening. The task force recommends colonoscopy every 10en years for people between the ages of 50 and 75, yet the year-old Fryback has concluded it does not make sense for him to get screened. He came to that decision in part because he has no family history of colon cancer. He also knows that getting the exam requires at least a day of taking laxatives to clean out the colon and then facing the possibility of a perforation from the procedure, a risk that goes up with age. He balanced the possible reduction in his chances of dying of colon cancer against his other health problems. He had a heart attack last year and suspects he will die of heart disease before a colon polyp has a chance to kill him. Called patient decision aids, these tools come in the form of brochures, videos, and Web-based interactive programs; some include interviews with cancer survivors and people considering getting screened, who discuss their own decisions. Patients can sometimes take them home to study at their own pace. Suzanne Bull used a patient decision aid DVD before opting to undergo radiation treatment for her breast cancer. The fact is, both are risks when we get screened for cancer. Check out these books, which help with decisions about testing and treatment: Should I Be Tested for Cancer? Schwartz, MD, and H.
