Originally, Mind Over Matter was about tempting Pooh to think about getting thinner again. The original lyrics can be heard on the soundtrack album from Disneyland Records. In the end, it ended up being the "Heave Ho" song in the final film. Instead he would pronounce it more like, "hoovering". This is how a midwesterner would say it. As Richard played the piano and sang, he repeatedly stumbled over the lyric, unable to get past the second line of the song. At that time designer Tony Walton was working on Poppins. He was English born, and he was about our age, so we asked him to give us some insight on the Pooh character. His eyes lit up. He explained how he had been a chubby little boy, and had felt very insecure. But Winnie the Pooh was his buddy, because Pooh was pudgy and proud of it. Pooh was probably the only character in the world who exercised to gain weight! Pooh was a wonderful, lovable friend who would never let you down or turn his back on you. Soon, we started to fall in love with Pooh ourselves. Our songs for Winnie the Pooh were truly a love affair, thanks to A. Milne and to Tony Walton. I read them over and over, and then many years later to my children, and now to my grandchildren. In June , Disney acquired the film rights. By , Disney told his animation staff that he was planning to make a full-length animated feature film based on the books. A meeting was held with senior staff members to discuss the proposed film, and during the meeting, Disney decided not to make a feature film, but instead a featurette that could be attached to a live-action film. He selected Wolfgang Reitherman to direct the project in hopes of Americanizing the characters and including more humor. It would later be included as a segment in The Many Adventures of Winnie the Pooh , which included the two further Pooh featurettes, released on March 11, . The film had its television premiere on March 10, , as a special on the NBC television network. The special was sponsored by Sears , who was then the exclusive provider of Pooh merchandise. The flavoring, with some nice tunes stirred in, is exactly rightâ€”wistful, sprightly and often hilarious. Shepard called the short a travesty.

Milne stories of Winnie the Pooh: After repairing his torn rump, he discovers that his jar of honey is nearly empty and starts wondering where he can get honey as he eats what is left in the pot. He first tries climbing the tree, but that does not work when the branch he is standing on breaks, and he tumbles to the ground into a "gorse-bush". He then borrows a blue balloon from a human boy named Christopher Robin in an attempt to fool the bees and get the honey. Cleverly, Pooh disguises himself as a little black rain cloud by dunking himself with mud, and then uses the balloon to float up next to the hive. A lone bee guard flies out to meet him and is very wary of the little black rain cloud. Pooh sticks his hand into the hive and accidentally pulls out a giant handful of honey with bees on it, eating the honey, but spitting the bees out after a lengthy battle in his mouth. Among them is the queen bee, who is ticked off with Pooh Bear and kicks her away, making her fall into the same muddy spot in which he disguised himself. Pooh is soon surrounded and attacked by angry bees from the hive, his disguise wearing off. After getting out of the mud puddle, the queen bee sees the little black rain cloud is a bear, and shook the mud off of herself. Angry, the bee shoots up toward Pooh and stings his bottom as revenge for knocking her in the muddy spot. The sudden hit causes Pooh to swing upward and back, jamming his rear into the bottom of the hive. The now nervous Pooh admits to Christopher Robin that these are the wrong sorts of bees, and is shoved out of the hole by the incensed insects who proceed to give chase. During the pursuit, the string holding the balloon closed comes loose and the balloon flies out of control. Pooh is taken for a wild ride as the bees continue to chase him. The queen bee continues laughing but is now forced to take cover as her quarry whizzes by her twice. The chase is suddenly reversed as the bees are now chased by Pooh. The defeated bear inevitably falls back to earth and lands in the arms of Christopher Robin. Pooh then confesses, "You never can tell with bees! Pooh visits Rabbit, hoping to finding honey there. So he asks for more. Pooh, his face covered with honey and all sticky, thanks Rabbit and eats leftover honey on his stomach, which is now extremely round and full. Rabbit then goes off to find Christopher Robin for help. While he waits, Pooh is visited by Owl and Gopher. Gopher offers to free Pooh using dynamite, but Owl angrily declines. Christopher Robin, Rabbit, and Eeyore arrive and try to help Pooh but they cannot budge him one inch from all the honey. Christopher Robin suggests pushing him back in but Rabbit protests. So everyone comes to a solution; Pooh will have to stop eating and get thin again. Gopher agrees to allow this, but soon Rabbit, fearing an extended period of Pooh being stuck, runs outside and stops Gopher, then posts a sign forbidding anyone to feed Pooh at all Rabbit: As the days go by, Pooh finally slims down enough to be freed, and Rabbit is delighted. While the others are pulling on Pooh, Rabbit pushes from behind but the bear will not move. Fed up with all this delay, Rabbit takes several steps backwards and charges into Pooh. Pooh comes in for a landing in the hole of a similar honey tree, flushing out the same swirling swarm of bees that once fought Pooh. The gang runs after him and finds him stuck in the honey tree. Christopher Robin tells Pooh that they will help him get out again but Pooh tells them to take their time; the bees were scared away by his abrupt arrival giving the silly old bear a chance to enjoy a hive full of his favorite honey.

Winnie the Pooh and the Honey Tree: Milne, who was born in London and was largely inspired by his son the real life Christopher Robin and his interaction with a Canadian bear named Winnie at the London Zoo. The first chapter of what would eventually become the book Winnie-the-Pooh was published on Christmas Eve, 1926, in the London Evening News, and immediately captured the attention of audiences. It was followed by two books and additional stories, all authored by Milne. The character was beloved. Both children and adults were captivated. Milne had a relationship with Walt Disney before the rights to Pooh were purchased: Disney artists admired the story and illustrator E. N. Southworth. Walt decided to begin with a series of minute featurettes to introduce Pooh to film-going audiences. Richard and Robert Sherman, even then legendary, were assigned to handle songwriting duties, with Buddy Baker doing the incidental music. As Finch points out, the team faced a number of challenges, including modifying the original Shepard drawings for Disney animation while still maintaining the essential style, and translating the playful A. A. Milne verbal humor into visual equivalents. Shepard illustrated every literary Pooh story and these drawings, with their hatched style, became intrinsically linked to the character. Also, there was the matter of the Englishness of the material. Pooh himself ended up being a surprisingly difficult character to animate, since he had to come across as an actual teddy bear with that kind of stiffness and a living, breathing character, with the animators erring on the side of more fluid movements. One of the best visual gags in the incredibly charming film, in which Rabbit must help Pooh unstuck himself from a window too much honey takes its toll, but first decorates his rear end with a potted plant turns into a moose head, was conceived by Walt Disney himself. Finch also points to the Americanized house Christopher Robin lives in, and the locomotive toy on his floor. But the featurette is also quite faithful to the material, especially in its depiction of the storybook land that the characters inhabit. The art style, too, retains the essence of the original character and the setting, while also making it more dimensional and, of course, more Disney. The featurette was released theatrically in February 1966, with the live-action Dean Jones comedy The Ugly Dachshund, and it was an immediate success. It is a testament to the power of that original featurette that so much of the iconography and key scenes from it are still used today particularly in The Many Adventures of Winnie the Pooh attraction at Disneyland. This was most likely due to both the magical alchemy of the creative team Walt assembled, and the fact that the source material was so inherently lovable. It probably also benefited from being the only Pooh animated project that Walt himself was personally involved in; his contributions cannot be overstated. Soon enough, though, it was time to head back to the Hundred Acre Wood.

Share Winnie the Pooh and the Honey Tree is a film combining live-action and animation. It was released by The Walt Disney Company. Based on the first two chapters of the book Winnie-the-Pooh by A. Milne, it is the only Winnie the Pooh production to be released under the supervision of Walt Disney before his death on December 15, 1966. Music and lyrics were written by the Sherman Brothers Richard M. Sherman and Robert B. Sherman. Background music was provided by Buddy Baker. This featurette was shown before The Ugly Dachshund. Plot Edit The story opens with Pooh Bear going through his morning exercise, during which he accidentally rips the stitching on his bottom. After repairing his torn rump, Pooh goes to his pantry for some breakfast, but finds he is fresh out of honey. He hears a bee fly by and decides to climb the honey tree, but while climbing the branch he is standing on breaks and he falls, landing in a gorse bush. He rolls himself in a muddy puddle to disguise himself as a little black raincloud, and then uses the balloon to float up next to the hive. Once he reaches the beehive he takes a giant handful of honey with bees still in it. He eats the honey then spits out the bees, one of which is the queen bee who falls into the mud below. A now scared Pooh admits to Christopher Robin these are the wrong sorts of bees and the angry bees end up pushing him out the hive and chasing Pooh and Christopher Robin. The two barely manage to escape the angry swarm by diving into the mud puddle. Pooh thanks Rabbit and eats leftover honey on his stomach which is now very round and full, before trying to go out the front door which he came in through, but becomes stuck because of his now over-sized bottom, which has become too fat to fit through the door. As Rabbit runs off to fetch Christopher Robin for help, Owl flies over and sees the predicament Pooh is in, declaring that an expert is needed, which Gopher claims to be. Gopher offers to free Pooh using dynamite but Pooh refuses. Rabbit returns with Christopher Robin and Eeyore in tow. They unsuccessfully try to pull Pooh Bear out. Eventually, Christopher Robin decides that Pooh will just have to wait to get thin again. One night, while Pooh is asleep, Gopher pops out of the ground once again. Gopher is carrying a lunchbox with him. One of the things Gopher is snacking on is a jar of honey, and Rabbit manages to prevent Pooh getting a lick and sternly insists that nobody feeds the bear. The gang runs after him, and Christopher Robin tells Pooh that they will help him get out again, but Pooh tells them to take their time now he has an ample supply of honey to eat.
