By Kristina Randle, Ph. A sort of happy isolation. Feeling that Reality is Unreal A. I would need many more details about your symptoms to know what, if anything, may be wrong. For instance, it would have been helpful to have answers to the following questions: Do you have a recent history of substance use? How often do you feel as though nothing is real? When did these feelings begin? Are you engaging in any particular activity when these feelings occur? Did you recently began taking a new medication? There are several general possibilities that may explain your symptoms: If you have used drugs or alcohol recently, your symptoms may be a side effect of those substances. Depersonalization disorder is characterized by feeling detached or estranged from oneself. Sometimes individuals with this disorder describe feeling as though they are in a movie or living in a dream. Derealization is the experience of feeling as though the external world is strange or not real. Depersonalization disorder typically develops in adolescence or early adulthood average age is about 16 and can be exacerbated by a traumatic event. Depersonalization disorder is categorized as a dissociative disorder and may be associated with other conditions such as schizophrenia , panic disorder, acute stress disorder, another type of dissociative disorder, drug use, or a general medical problem. My recommendation is to have an evaluation by a mental health professional. An evaluation could determine if you should be concerned about your symptoms, if your symptoms require treatment and if you have a mental health condition. It is advantageous to receive an objective opinion from a trained professional when experiencing unusual psychological symptoms. I wish you the best of luck. She works in private practice with adults, adolescents and families. ### 2: Feeling that Reality is Unreal | Ask the Therapist

Nothing In This World Lyrics: I can picture us in the living room / By the mantle piece / And you tellin me you love me / With your hands on my thighs / While I'm starin in your brown eyes.

Lee Frank had already given his own list, The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing. All that is needed for the forces of evil to triumph is for enough good men to do nothing. All that is required for evil to prevail is for good men to do nothing. All that is needed for evil to prevail is for good men to do nothing. The surest way for evil to prevail is for good men to do nothing. All it will take for evil to prevail is for good people to do nothing. All that is necessary for the forces of evil to take root in the world is for enough good men to do nothing. All that is needed for the forces of evil to succeed is for enough good men to remain silent. All it takes for Evil to prevail in this world is for enough good men to do nothing. The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing. The asterisk at the end of the quote gives a hypertext link to the end of his essay, where the variant forms he has found are collected. Furthermore the quote had already been exposed as bogus in the alt. Here is Frank Lynch writing on 9 February The quote you seek is generally attributed to Edmund Burke, an 18th Century British Statesman, famous for impeaching Warren Hastings, a book on the French Revolution "Reflections on the Revolution In France" and some fairly liberal positions towards the American colonies. Am I missing something obvious to everyone else? Because to me the two quotes seem quite different, both in form and meaning. The possible meaning that might be attached to the triumph-of-evil quote, are fully perhaps too fully explored in the first essay. Anyway, the complete answer to the origins of the triumph-of-evil quote is not to be found on the Web, but in a very neat dictionary of misquotations I have discovered by Paul F Boller and John George called They never said it Oxford University Press, But the letter to Smith was dated January 29, , and it said nothing about the triumph of evil. It would seem in fact that the yoking together of the triumph-of-evil quote with the bad-men-combine quote goes back to Ms Beck. The two quotes often occur side-by-side on internet quote lists, which is probably why people assume one must be a paraphrase of the other. Their preface traces the history of quotes in the USA as instruments of political rhetoric. First their use, then their misuse, and finally their invention. The purely mendacious activity of conscious quote-faking they associate with the political right, Radicals have plenty of quotations from Karl Marx, anyway, and probably see no need to add to the Marxist treasure-house. Extreme rightists in America have a real problem, in any case; they would like to cite the Founding Fathers, but rarely find what they want in Franklin, Washington, and Jefferson. And certainly tracing the triumph-of-evil quote over the Web does keep taking you far more often than you would like to extreme rightist pages from the USA - John Birchers, libertarians, gun nuts, pro-life extremists of the abortion debate, and so on. The heart of darkness of the world wide web. Let us look at it exactly in context. Here is Burke in full flood, employing his usual never-use-one-word-when-three-will-do style: Whilst men are linked together, they easily and speedily communicate the alarm of any evil design. They are enabled to fathom it with common counsel, and to oppose it with united strength. Whereas, when they lie dispersed, without concert, order, or discipline, communication is uncertain, counsel difficult, and resistance impracticable. In a connection, the most inconsiderable man, by adding to the weight of the whole, has his value, and his use; out of it, the greatest talents are wholly unserviceable to the public. No man, who is not inflamed by vain-glory into enthusiasm, can flatter himself that his single, unsupported, desultory, unsystematic endeavours, are of power to defeat the subtle designs and united cabals of ambitious citizens. When bad men combine, the good must associate; else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle. A bit of background: The Whigs were the dominant party, or at least they had been from about up to the time when Burke was writing in , but in the late s the power structure established by the Whigs was beginning to crumble. Burke was a Whig, and is calling on the Whigs to unite against a new Tory power-base that had grown up around George III under the Earl of Bute, which was extra-parliamentary, and therefore, to Burke, unconstitutional. Whig power was held together not by a modern party structure, but by a system of patronage and influence that ran from top to bottom of society, and Burke is urging the Whigs to unite into a party to combat the new Tory threat. The bad men are the Tories. The good men are the Whigs. The fall of the good men would be their fall from office. The struggle would be contemptible because, without party unity, they would not stand a chance, and they would be unpitied because their adversaries would be merciless. The bad-men-combine quote is therefore a call for politicians to unite into parties. If we look at its use on the web, we find that, in a sample of pages where it occurs: In other words it is out of context, and we cannot tell what meaning the quoter thinks it has. The pages where it is misunderstood are those of general interest, which suggests that unless you have read the original quote in Burke you are liable misunderstand it. Here is a typical example of its misuse: Today there are brave men and women fighting for their freedom and independence against great odds. In Afghanistan, in Angola, and in Nicaragua, lightly armed freedom fighters face Soviet tanks, artillery, and helicopter gunships. We must give those heroes what they need, not just to fight and die for freedom but to win for freedom. The quoter is President Reagan, in a speech of 6 February The President went on, And that is why the United States must help those struggling for freedom in Nicaragua. In the cause of liberty, all free people are part of the same family. We should stand together as brothers and sisters. And if we do, the Nicaraguan people will be able to free themselves from Communist tyranny and win the liberty that you now enjoy in Grenada. Can we learn anything from all this? Going back to the triumph-of-evil quote, we may ask, how can we defend ourselves from the bogus quote? It is clearly unreasonable for anyone to have to prove a quote bogus. This Burke quote, for example, is, I am certain, bogus, The hottest fires in hell are reserved for those who remain neutral in times of moral crisis Edmund Burke.

3: Essay on Nothing is Impossible in the World

In this world, everything is possible on the basis of will power, dogged determination and sacrifice. To accomplish the most difficult tasks, you need to put in a lot of hard work, extra perseverance and concentration on a single objective. You should have patience and faith in yourself. You should have determination, dedication and devotion to attain success. Never bother about the results. Keep on going even if the pace is slow. Just ensure it remains steady. You are bound to face obstacles en route to success, but with courage and perseverance, you can master them. Your positive attitude and clear frame of mind determine your future. By your own ideas, will and ability, you can create a number of chances, circumstances and the desired atmosphere to achieve the toughest goal. Great minds have purposes, whereas others simply have wishes. Little minds are tamed and subdued by seeming setbacks, but great minds rise above them and fight their way to victory. Always and never are a fighter and never a quitter. To attain your desired goal, you have to laugh at your trouble and have to forget it. When you laugh at your trouble, you will find it to be a mere bubble, which is swiftly blown away. To gather the fruit, to register victory, to score success, you require unwavering faith in yourself. Faith, works like miracle. It looks beyond all boundaries, transcends all limitations, conquers all obstacles and carries you to your goal. Therefore have faith, take courage and march ahead, onward and upward, till you attain the goal. Nothing is achieved without great enthusiasm and effort. Enthusiasm puts a sparkle in your eyes, a lilt in your steps. It often makes you perform, extraordinary feats in very ordinary situations. Our freedom fighters-Mahatma Gandhi, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose and many others- are glaring examples of the fact that impossibilities work as a boon for next attempt towards possibilities. They had faced brutal and oppressive treatment from the Britishers. Their movements and efforts could not always get the desired results. There were times, which were highly distractive and frustrating but they did not allow frustrations to shake their will. They continued their movement with vigour and enthusiasm, and ultimately succeeded in reaching their destination. It could become possible only due to their hard work and indomitable will power to overcome the toughest challenges. Look at the splendid performance of Indian sports prodigy, Sania Mirza. She stole the limelight by becoming the first Indian to make it to the third round of a Grand Slam viz. The honour, which she got, was not achieved in one day. The other stalwart is Mahendra Singh Dhoni, the wicketkeeper of the Indian cricket team who, as wicketkeeper-batsman, created a world- record in ODIs when he knocked a blitzkrieg not out against Sri Lanka in Jaipur Rajasthan in October. The knock of , which contained runs 10 sixes and 15 fours is another world record of most runs in 6s and 4s in an ODI innings. The Indian cricket team was battered badly in Sri Lanka a few months ago and was surrounded by contradictions. However, they came out strong and proved that they are the winners. India won four consecutive ODIs in after a gap of 11 years. They won both the One Day International and the Test Series against Sri Lanka and showed to the world that they have the stuff of champions in them. The coveted honour did not come to our cricket team as a windfall. This was the result of strenuous practice, unwavering faith and a never-say-die spirit. Their glorious success came just because of positive mental make-up, hard work, playing as a well-knit team and disciplined approach. Nelson Mandela, the former President of South Africa is another example. He succeeded in his war against Apartheid in his nation, in spite of various failures. Last, but not the least, Mother Teresa got the Nobel Peace Prize for working relentlessly for the ill, poor and needy people. He is invariably an optimist. Never let your mind think that any work is impossible. Always endeavour with new zeal. When you are not able to reach your destination or goal because of some personal limitation-either real or imaginary-you suffer from the feelings of despair. Both physical and psychological handicaps may be the causes of despair or frustration. Vernon Howard can be quoted as saying: Never express yourself as being inferior, for if you do, you will believe what you say. Your attitude should be right. With a resolute, positive and committed attitude you can invariably develop the right aptitude. That is why Dr. Karl Meninger had stated unequivocally: Just as the dust tarnishes even the brightest of a gem, despair too contaminates the virtues of the wise. When illusion overwhelms reality, when fantasy displaces pragmatism, when madness conquers sanity, there is only one factor to blame himself. Mind makes the distinction between good and bad, happiness and sad triumph and defeat. It rests entirely upon the mind whether to draw line a little towards this side or that. Mind should be the haven of all good emotions of life. It is the temple of true love. It can hold more beauty than even nature itself. It is, above all, the furnace, which tempers man. Thus, it can be emphatically stated that mind is the moulder of the impossible to the possible. This denotes that success comes through hard work, perseverance and perspiration. Years of hard work made Rome a beautiful city in the world. In the movie Black, Rani Mukherjee has played the role of girl who is blind, but by her own efforts, dedication determination, gets graduation degree at the age of 18. Had she given up in between, she would have been surrounded by despair. Depression, fear, anger and frustration leave deep rooted permanent scars on our psyche. It has been rightly said by Disraeli that "despair is the conclusion of fools. Nothing is impossible in this world. This implies that you can do anything, if you have will to do it. The WILL is like "the hammer that shatters glass but forges steel".

4: 7 Reasons Why You Will Never Do Anything Amazing With Your Life | HuffPost

There's nothing in this world I wouldn't do for you boy I don't care what the others say now that I got you babe No one can bring me joy like you girl.

Philosophy Western philosophy Some would consider the study of "nothing" to be foolish. A typical response of this type is voiced by Giacomo Casanova in conversation with his landlord, one Dr. Gozzi, who also happens to be a priest: When I said to him, and proved to him, that the existence of nothingness was absurd, he cut me short, calling me silly. In philosophy, to avoid linguistic traps over the meaning of "nothing", a phrase such as not-being is often employed to make clear what is being discussed. Parmenides One of the earliest Western philosophers to consider nothing as a concept was Parmenides 5th century BC , who was a Greek philosopher of the monist school. He argued that "nothing" cannot exist by the following line of reasoning: To speak of a thing, one has to speak of a thing that exists. Since we can speak of a thing in the past, this thing must still exist in some sense now, and from this he concludes that there is no such thing as change. As a corollary, there can be no such things as coming-into-being, passing-out-of-being, or not-being. For those of us that believe in physics, the distinction between past, present and future is only a stubbornly persistent illusion. He accepted the monist position that there could be no motion without a void. The void is the opposite of being. On the other hand, there exists something known as an absolute plenum , a space filled with matter, and there can be no motion in a plenum because it is completely full. But, there is not just one monolithic plenum, for existence consists of a multiplicity of plenums. These are the invisibly small "atoms" of Greek atomist theory, later expanded by Democritus circa BC BC , which allows the void to "exist" between them. In this scenario, macroscopic objects can come-into-being, move through space, and pass into not-being by means of the coming together and moving apart of their constituent atoms. The void must exist to allow this to happen, or else the "frozen world" of Parmenides must be accepted. Bertrand Russell points out that this does not exactly defeat the argument of Parmenides but, rather, ignores it by taking the rather modern scientific position of starting with the observed data motion, etc. Russell also observes that both sides were mistaken in believing that there can be no motion in a plenum, but arguably motion cannot start in a plenum. Leucippus is therefore the first to say that "nothing" has a reality attached to it. In this scenario, space is not "nothing" but, rather, a receptacle in which objects of matter can be placed. The true void as "nothing" is different from "space" and is removed from consideration. For Descartes, there was matter, and there was extension of matter leaving no room for the existence of "nothing". Although Descartes views on this were challenged by Blaise Pascal , he declined to overturn the traditional belief, horror vacui , commonly stated as "nature abhors a vacuum". This remained so until Evangelista Torricelli invented the barometer in and showed that an empty space appeared if the mercury tube was turned upside down. This phenomenon being known as the Torricelli vacuum and the unit of vacuum pressure, the torr , being named after him. His ideas mostly stem from, or are based on his work of translating pseudo-Dionysius. His beliefs are essentially pantheist and he classifies evil, amongst many other things, into not-being. This is done on the grounds that evil is the opposite of good, a quality of God, but God can have no opposite, since God is everything in the pantheist view of the world. Similarly, the idea that God created the world out of "nothing" is to be interpreted as meaning that the "nothing" here is synonymous with God. Hegel Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel is the philosopher who brought the dialectical method to a new pinnacle of development. According to Hegel in Science of Logic , the dialectical methods consists of three steps. First, a thesis is given, which can be any proposition in logic. Second, the antithesis of the thesis is formed and, finally, a synthesis incorporating both thesis and antithesis. Hegel believed that no proposition taken by itself can be completely true. Only the whole can be true, and the dialectical synthesis was the means by which the whole could be examined in relation to a specific proposition. Truth consists of the whole process. Separating out thesis, antithesis, or synthesis as a stand-alone statement results in something that is in some way or other untrue. The concept of "nothing" arises in Hegel right at the beginning of his Logic. The whole is called by Hegel the "Absolute" and is to be viewed as something spiritual. The Absolute is Pure Being Antithesis: The Absolute is Nothing Synthesis: Sartre claims that this second kind of being is "nothing" since consciousness cannot be an object of consciousness and can possess no essence. Equating nothingness with being leads to creation from nothing and hence God is no longer needed for there to be existence. A classic example of this is an archer attempting to erase the mind and clear the thoughts to better focus on the shot. Some authors have pointed to similarities between the Buddhist conception of nothingness and the ideas of Martin Heidegger and existentialists like Sartre, [20] [21] although this connection has not been explicitly made by the philosophers themselves. The Kyoto School handles the concept of nothingness as well. Ternary logic In computing , "nothing" can be a keyword in VB. Net used in place of something unassigned, a data abstraction. Many systems have similar capabilities but different keywords, such as " null " e. This is a control abstraction ; a processor that executes NOP will behave identically to a processor that does not process this directive.

5: Quote by C.S. Lewis: "œlf we find ourselves with a desire that nothing"

I can do what she can do so much better Nothing in this world can turn out the light I'm gonna make you feel alright, tonight. Da da, da da da da da, tonight.

Learning to live is learning to let go. Learning to let go is learning to be happy. We get attached to our ideas, our way of doing things, to places, to things and the many people present in our lives, not knowing that all of our attachments will only bring us anguish, sorrow, and suffering. I am not saying I am at the level where I can have things, where I can move from one place to another, where I can leave or be left by those I love without feeling sad. I really believe it takes time and practice to get there, but I am definitely way better at it than I was years ago. It will be so much easier if we could appreciate what we have if we could appreciate our friends, our family if we could love all of them without being attached to them. Giving birth and nourishing, having without possessing, acting with no expectations, leading and not trying to control: The problem is that most of us get so attached to all of these things, all of these people, all of these places, and once we lose them, and one day we will all go through this, we will be heartbroken, devastated, and the pain will be so hard to bear. For me, this is a very dangerous approach to life. This is why we need to understand that nothing lasts forever, that people come and go, that things come and go, and that there are days when we have more, while other when we have less. Some days we might be healthy while other days we might be sick. Some days we might be safe and some days we might be in danger. It goes on, and on, and on. What does this even mean? That when we are born, we are nothing, nobody and as we go along, as we grow older and as we are being shaped by our family, school and society, we start becoming something and somebody? Does this make any sense to you? The clothes we wear, the friends we have, the schools we go to, the parents we have etc. Why do we do this to ourselves? Why do we put labels on people, things, places, ideas? I guide my life based on the idea that, the way you treat others will determine how others will treat you, and the way you treat life will determine how life will treat you and I try to empathize with others and I try to help as much as I can, whenever I can. I try to keep my mind open and allow new people, new ideas to enter my life, for I believe that they are all teachers of mine. Love Everything, Be Attached To Nothing If a person is wiping floors for a living while you are the owner of that building, that does not give you the right to be disrespectful to that person. That does not make him a less of a person. If it were to put you both in a room, naked, no clothes on, who will even know the difference between the rich and the poor, between the special and not so special? How can that even be possible, when we are constantly racing with one another? We are always trying to be better than everybody else, we are always trying to make more money, have bigger houses, bigger cars, expensive things so that we can differentiate ourselves from the not so special ones. I know people who are so identified with what they do, the places they live in, the clothes they wear, the money they have, that they lost all of their humanity, they lost track of who they really are. This kind of people has won the world but lost their souls. They think that money, power, fame, and fortune is all that life is about, always looking to gain more, to be better than everybody, to be number one etc. I guess you have all heard the stories of those wealthy people who lost their fortunes, and because of that, they decided to put an end to their lives. This is what happens when you only live for accumulating more, and more, and more, and this is what happens when you identify yourself with all of them. Where is the peace in that?

6: Evil Quotes ( quotes)

The question of existence goes deeper than that. You offer this world its very own existence, because your observable universe cannot exist if you're not there to observe it.

Actually, you should be very worried. You should drop everything and immediately question your existence on earth. You should find a mirror, look yourself in the eyes, raise your hand and slap yourself in the face. The kinds of skills you develop in the real world, outside the bubble of your parents protection or the ideological indoctrination that has overwhelmed our entire educational system. Skills that can be had by anyone willing to pay the price to get them. Skills that are quickly becoming extinct. Skills you can only learn by doing; by learning how to fly after jumping off the cliff. Skills that can only be developed when you find your true self. When you put yourself on the line or otherwise expose yourself to the possibility of failure. The skills you can only develop when you are willing to risk it all in order to do that one amazing thing. Skills that up until now, you thought you had. Because it is easier to talk about learning that new programming? Because as I fail, I learn, and then adjust my course to make sure my path is always forward. The shape of a sword with polished edges and a razor sharp blade that will cut you in half if you are not equally hardened. Because you are afraid to embrace your true self for fear of how the world will see you. You think that because you judge others, this means that those people must, in-turn, be judging you. Because I will recklessly abandon all insecurities and expose my true self to the world. I will become immune to the impact of your opinion and stand naked in a crowd of ideas; comfortable in knowing that while you married the mundane I explored the exceptional. Because you learned what you had to learn in order to pass their tests and you think that makes you smart. Because you think learning is only something people do in schools. Because while you were away at college, I was studying life. Because instead of learning about the world in a classroom I went out and learned it by living. Because I know more than any piece of paper you could ever frame from a university. Tests that are not graded on a bell curve or by percentages; tests that are graded by one simple stipulation: Because you think history is boring and philosophy is stupid. Because you would rather sit and watch E! Because you refuse to acknowledge that all the power in the world comes from the words of those that lived before us. That anything you desire can be had by searching through the multitude of words that are available to us now more abundantly than ever before. Because you are probably not reading this article even though you know you should. Because the people that are reading this already know these things. Because you are unwilling to ask this simple question Because you call me a know-it-all but refuse to call yourself a know-nothing-at-all. Because I thirst for knowledge, regardless the topic. Because while you waste your time with Tosh. Because if we were to go heads-up in a debate, I would crush you. I would make it a point to defeat my own argument; from every imaginable angle; in order to understand everything you might be able to use against me. Because I would dedicate myself to understanding both sides of the argument so thoroughly that I could argue your side for you and win; even after having just handed you a defeat in the same debate. Unable to question reality; stuck in a self imposed survival strategy within a matrix-style monotony. Because I know that you will give me all the information I need to destroy you by letting you talk. Because I study human behaviors and you ignore everyone but yourself. Because I watch how you say the things you say just as closely as I listen to what you say; and you say way too much! Because control comes, not from spewing your ignorance like some incurable case of logorrhea, but from properly structuring the context of your questions. Because I study the premise of your argument and destroy it from the ground level before you even get a chance to establish your ideas. Because even if I told you everything could be different tomorrow you would wait until then to begin doing anything about it. Because you think that since I have not acknowledged you, it means that I have not seen you. Because, you walk around with your head up your ass, oblivious to the world around you. Blissfully ignorant of the reality that sits so close to your face that if you stuck your tongue out, just once, you would taste it and realize how delicious the truth actually is. Because you would become an instant addict. Unable to pull yourself from the teat of truth. Finally able to understand your lack of understanding, and then you would see; then you would know that the only thing holding you back from doing something truly amazing, is you.
