Creator Jim Jinkins based the series on his hometown of Richmond, Virginia. Doug was created by animator Jim Jinkins. Jinkins first sketched the character of Doug while doodling without thought, not aiming to create a character based on himself. He began to view the character as his "alter-ego," drawing him in variously cynical and silly scenarios in his sketchbook. Jinkins had actually worked at the network before it was renamed Nickelodeon; he was employed in the late s when it was named Pinwheel. Jinkins founded Jumbo Pictures to produce Doug. He would later recall the oddity of the deal, remarking, "that was a moment in time where we were able to be an independent production company and deliver those shows. Jinkins felt it was important to not insert overly religious themes into the series, but he viewed it essential that each episode contain a moral. Jinkins asked each writer to place a central theme at the top of each script " what issue Doug is dealing with, and what he learns. While developing the series, Jinkins wanted to change its name from Doug to The Funnies, but the network encouraged him to stick with the original name. The show also incorporated homemade sound effects. Subsequent seasons, however, use a single piece of music for their closing credits despite using the same animation. Starting with the Disney series, the credits have used Doug chasing Porkchop to the left and right while the credits play. The original deal required Jumbo to produce 65 episodes of Doug, which Nickelodeon would air in blocks of 13 per season. The network had a two-year window in which it could reverse the decision. The duo received strong interest from several networks, among them ABC. The deal involved buying Jumbo Pictures and "signing them to five-year contracts, with stock options, to be Disney executives. Someone just dimmed the magic a bit. We put ourselves through enormous pain to avoid pain and I had this notion of: What if we just told the truth? I wanted to show kids a world where everyone took honesty seriously. In the episode, Doug is rewarded with a stick of gum. In that case, I wanted Doug to do something that hurt where there was no tangible reward," said Jinkins.
