In fact, the majority of hunters will put up with a degree of all these unpleasanties if it guarantees dependable shooting. These hard-chargers can be found among duck hunting communities across the nation. While facing unique challenges from their environments, they all rely on innovation and a dogged determination to be successful in the field. On the following pages, four hunters—Scott Dickerson, Shawn Prince, Mike Brumley, and Butch Wagoner—explain why they enjoy embarking on what many would consider extreme hunts. Devised by hardy Chesapeake Bay watermen, this austere style of waterfowling involves wearing a pair of chest waders or a diving suit and hunkering down among a large spread of decoys in knee- to chest-deep water. Body booting was widely popular among the locals in this area. They were always willing to do it because it was so effective, and it was cheaper than renting a farm. For concealment and convenience, they constructed oversized Canada goose silhouettes mounted with a gun rack on one side. These customized decoys also swivel on a metal pole anchored to the bottom, allowing hunters to always keep the silhouettes broadside to approaching waterfowl. Rectangular cutouts enable hunters to watch birds from behind the silhouettes. While a tender boat is typically kept close at hand, body booting is not without risks. The closest call we ever had was when an ice floe drifted into our rig and started pushing us and all our decoys out toward deeper water. Fortunately the tender boat rescued us just in time, but if we had gotten swept under the ice, we could have been in real trouble. A strong wind means big swells and lots of spray. The farther you go out, the rougher it gets. He also never goes out alone and is always accompanied by another equally seaworthy boat. Prince and his hunting partners hunt sea ducks directly off ledges located from one to five miles offshore. After setting the spread, we moor one boat, and four of us hide among the rocks on an island, while two remain in a tender boat to retrieve ducks that are too far for the dogs. They fly 30 miles an hour, low to the water and straight at you. This kind of shooting is really unique, and I enjoy taking people who have never experienced a sea duck hunt before. Ducks learn to avoid those areas soon after the start of the season. But there are plenty of ducks in the area from October to freezeup in November. You have to be willing to go find them. Facing this challenge led him to revive the lost art of marsh skiing. The skis were fashioned out of ash and measured eight to 12 feet long and less than a foot wide. They were made long enough to distribute your weight across the cattails and to span muskrat channels. In the early part of the season, green-winged teal and shovelers fill his bag. When he finds himself in a place ducks want to be, Brumley claims that his most valuable accessory is a like-minded six-year-old Chesapeake Bay retriever. According to Dickerson, mallards and other ducks seek out flooded openings in the woods to escape high hunting pressure in surrounding agricultural fields. After a mile to a mile-and-a-half boat ride, the real work begins for Dickerson and company. Dickerson has no doubt that the payoff is worth the effort: There is no way to describe how good it feels to work a big group of mallards down through the trees and all the way to the water.

Duck Hunting by Randy Frahm is a wonderful tool for the future duck hunter. It describes various types of birds, different ways of hunting those birds and the equipment needed. Frahm is very detailed in his descriptions, while maintaining a very basic approach to his writing so early readers can understand.

Just as deer hunters do, a lot of duck hunters plant food plots for ducks. An excellent choice when it comes to what to plant is Golden Millet. It could be in the ground for over 6 months before the season begins. A lot of things can go wrong in 6 months. In , Five Oaks Wildlife Services in Stuttgart, Arkansas developed Golden Millet as a way to set back succession in moist soil impoundments duck ponds and to grow as a second crop post harvest. Golden Millet allows duck hunters to cut down on the time their crop is sitting waiting on the birds to arrive. The most important factor in the planting date is to find the average first frost date and back up 75 days. For us here in south central Illinois our average first frost date is October 5th. So our planting window is around the last week of July. Just as we like variety, so do the ducks. Golden Millet is a forage ducks will hammer in cold or warm temperatures and can even be broadcasted into a stand of Round-up ready corn to provide a smorgasbord of food leading to happy ducks that stick around longer! Golden Millet is a prolific producer of forage and aggressive grower when planted and maintained correctly. Not only does it have the ability to produce up to lbs. In fact, simply broadcasting on the topsoil will get it to germinate if followed by a rain or if the field is flushed before broadcasting. There are several methods to planting Golden Millet, but they all result in straps of ducks come December! It can be planted in large open impoundments or in a tucked away hole in a green tree reservoir. When planning out your food plots for ducks, be sure to leave open areas within fields. Do not plant around your blinds so decoys will be visible and will move while hunting. This will also decrease likelihood of enforcement officer accusing you of baiting. You have to give the plants a place where they can get a jump start on growing. Here are some options for establishing Golden Millet as a food plot for your ducks: Get the water on and off in a 24 hour period Monitor germination If moisture is lost, It is critical that once the millet sprouts you have to flush the field after days. It is also critical that you can get the water on and off the field in 24 hours. If you catch a rain then you usually hit a home run. Once the plants gets to the 5 leaf phase you should apply 1. Focus on killing all broadleaves at early stages. At the same time you apply chemicals apply lbs. Put the field in a shallow flood. You can let the first flood dry up and give the plants a day or two out of the water, then bring the shallow flood back on and maintain the flood till the plants mature. Yes, this can be grown in a standing flood unlike other millets and corn. Get the water on and off in a 24 hour period Monitor germination If moisture is lost it is critical that once the millet sprouts you have to flush the field after days. Once the plants gets to 5 leaf phase you should apply 1. I sometimes let the first flood dry up and give the plants a day or two out of the water, then bring the shallow flood back on and maintain the flood till the plants mature. Usually after the first flushing and chemical is applied, the plants will reach shallow flood height. Once the plants reach inches, apply shallow flood and maintain shallow flood till maturity. In a year like this, mother nature is wreaking havoc on crops and food plots all over the country. The drought is causing crops to fail leaving farmers without income and this Fall, ducks with less food. Golden Millet can take mother nature out of the equation! If you have access to water for your impoundment like many do, you can flush it and drain it quickly to give the soil moisture for germination then broadcast your seed on. The moisture will help insure the plants get up quickly. Shortly after germinating, you can spray for broadleaves since Golden Millet is a grass. No need to wait for rain, you just have to wait on duck season to open! The window of opportunity to get your Golden Millet in the ground is quickly approaching. For more information on Golden Millet or to purchase it to plant it in your food plots for ducks , visit 5 Oaks Wildlife Services.

Chat about duck hunting, and share other duck hunting information. What is the cheapest yet practical way to get a carving blank? It seems that cork is pricy as well as that size of cedar. Even basswood is a bit pricy, but a lot better. I read up on the foamer process and will likely make a few, but am looking in to an economical wood option. Have you guys glued up blanks from smaller pieces? Where did you find the pattern books? So I want to get in to carving and ordered a couple of pattern books as well as read up in a couple "how to" books. I would highly recommend starting out with foamers. This will allow you to perfect your style while cutting the cost considerably if you make a mistake. Foam can be had on the cheap. After practicing on foam you can make the switch to wood with much more confidence. Welcome to the addiction Re: Foam gunners take shot very well and will continue to float Re: There has to be a great satisfaction to see ducks decoy to the blocks that you carved yourself. Readily available, super cheap, and soft, fairly easy to carve. Either find a mill where you can purchase a beam, say 4" thick x 8" wide, and as many feet long as you can manage. They can be cut into appropriate lengths and then split in half. Once dried the grain should lend itself to decoy shapes. You can usually find a few pieces big enough to carve out a decoy. We have a wood-mizer and my father and I have made many decoys from the scrap pieces of cedar. I also found a pile of pink foam in someones garbage yesterday, it pays to keep your eyes open while driving Re: Its heavy even when hollowed. White pine or white cedar is the way to go. Thanks for the tpe. I have been preaching this one for a while and no one bites! Find the blue dock flotation foam that I am sure is all over your marshes like mine. Look for good pieces with no or little barnacles. You shape it down into a tear-drop shape with a hand saw and then go to town with sure-form tools, sand paper and various rasps. It shaped very easily and will hold burlap etc really well. And if you blow it, just shape it down further into a buffie or something. I love working with it. Just make sure you dont get the one with all the of the wall species. This will give you a 5"H X 10"W block that makes a great wooden decoy. Cut out your pattern and carve it to rough shape. Split the block apart at the glue line the newsprint will make this easy , then hollow the block out. When done hollowing, sand the glue and paper off the joint surfaces, epoxy the two halves back together and finish the decoy. I have only hand tools. I hate to ask this question but how do I hollow out the wood?
